A WILD WEST EPISODE

By ELINOR MARSH

About 1867 Miss Martha Hildred, a young lady who had recently been graduated from a normal school in the east, received an offer to go to Denver to fill the position of teacher. At that time the Union Pacific railroad was building, and trains were running as far as Laramie. From Laramie the only public conveyance to Denver was by stagecoach.

The train lumbered over long stretches of alkali fields, a good deal of the way beside the Platte river, which, not having any trees on its banks, reminded her of a man with no hair or beard.

Miss Hildred reached Laramie in the evening, and, since the daily coach did not leave till the next morning, she took a room in a tavern and went to bed. The town had sprung up like a mushroom in the night, comprising that kind of population which can only be understood by a view of it. Miss Hildred was tired and would have slept soundly had it not been for revelry in a dance hall close by. "One lady more for this set!" "Always and left!" "Swing your partner!" "Lino!" were mingled in confusion.

This introduction to western life at that time was not encouraging, but a more vivid experience was reserved for the next day. After a sleepless night the young schoolma'am breakfasted and went out to board the coach for Denver. A man stood at the door, only permitting certain persons to enter. On seeing Miss Hildred he stopped her and was about to turn her back when a man standing near spoke to him, evidently referring to the young lady.

"Are you in it?" asked the man regarding the entrance.

Miss Hildred, supposing that he wished to know if she was going to Denver, gave an affirmative nod of her head. She got into the coach, the door was shut and the vehicle rolled away.

"I thort," said a woman, with a very coarse voice, "that there was to be six of us. I see there's seven."

"That's not countin' the kid," said a man in a white cravat which was supposed to designate him as a clergyman, at the same time casting a glance at Martha.

Three of the passengers were men and three were women, the latter all being strapping creatures apparently as strong as the men. Miss Hildred was on the back seat sandwiched between a man and a woman.

"Can you use another weepin, kid?" said the woman beside her. "I got one more'n I need."

Miss Hildred looked at her blankly, not understanding what she meant.

"Oh, I see! Mum's the word," said the other and made no further advances.

"There are no outsiders today," said one of the men, who wore the sombrero, woolen shirt and trousers tucked in his boots of the typical westerner of the period.

"No," replied a quiet little man, the only delicate looking person in the coach. "The agent concluded to manage it with only insiders. He was afraid that too many would scare 'em off."

All this was Greek to Miss Hildred, but she was thinking about what she would find in her new field of labor and was not paying any attention to it.

Suddenly a shot rang out ahead. The coach came to a stop, the door was thrown open, and two men stood facing it with short guns pointing into the coach.

"Step out, ladies and gentlemen," said the man nearest the door.

No one made a move to do so, but one of the women, apparently much frightened, cried out, "Don't shoot me!" and with her arm raised the muzzle of the gun held by the man standing nearest her. Another one of the passengers at the same time shook a Derringer pistol out of his sleeve and quick as a flash of lightning put a bullet into the brain of the man whose gun had been knocked up. The quiet little man covering in a corner suddenly seemed to explode, and the other road agent, for that is what the men without were, fell dead.

Miss Hildred at this point fainted dead away. When she came to herself she was stretched out beside the road, while six men stood about her. The first idea that popped into her head was as to where were the three women passengers. One of the men pulled out a flask and tried to induce her to take a drink, but she refused. Raising herself on her elbow in an effort to get up, she saw two dead men and fainted again. On coming to herself a second time one of the men exclaimed:

"How in thunder did you get into this gang?"

When later the coach rolled into Denver there was a first class story to be told. The express company, in order to entrap a couple of road agents who had infested the road, permitted it to leak out that it would send a treasury by that particular coach. Instead it sent six armed men, half of them in women clothes. Since all were disguised it was not easy for the person who admitted them to the coach to tell who belonged to the gang; hence the mistake in admitting the only real woman in the party.

The company made her a handsome present to atone for the mistake. The story remained attached to her, and as long as she stayed in Denver she was known as "the kid." The men in the coach supposed her to be a young fellow in woman's clothes.

$100 Reward, $100

The reader of this paper will be pleased to learn that there is at least one great disease that science has been able to cure in all its stages, and that is Cancer. The Cancer Cure is the only positive cure ever known to the medical fraternity. Cancer being a constitutional disease, requires a constitutional treatment. Dr. J. C. Tower's Cure is taken internally, acting directly upon the blood and mucous surfaces of the system, thereby destroying the foundation of the disease, and giving the patient strength by building up the constitution and assisting nature in doing its work. The proprietors have so much faith in its curative powers that they offer One Hundred Dollars for any case that it fails to cure. Send for free literature.
