FUNSTON

Frederick Funston was born for a life of adventure. In his restless way he had tried many things and none of them for long when he turned to soldering. Fresh from college, he had knocked about the world in search of a living, explored Alaska as a botanist before the Klondike days, had a brief business career in Mexico, and eventually landed in Cuba as a filibuster.

Naturally, the declaration of war against Spain found Funston ready to volunteer. He had planned to raise a regiment of rough riders for service in Cuba. Good fortune placed him in command of the Twentieth Kansas Regiment. When it reached San Francisco on the way to the Philippines, half the men had no uniforms.

Funston had received no military training beyond fighting as a bushwhacker in the Cuban jungle. Inevitably, regular army officers regarded him as unfit for his duties. They little understood him. Under his leadership in the Philippines the Kansas made a name for themselves by their exploits. Their tiny Colonel has justified himself. His future was safe. The daring capture of Aguinaldo, for which he was so unreasonably attacked, won him in 1901 the rank of Brigadier General in the regular army. At Vera Cruz he was promoted to be Major Gen'l. It was not by accident that in sixteen years the untrained volunteer rose to the highest rank in the United States army. Through force of character he created his own opportunities, and on his merits he reaped the rewards of a notable career.
