Sunlight Not Good Germicide.
Sunlight as a germicide proves to be less efficient and reliable—at least in temperate regions—than has been commonly supposed. In his experiments in Algiers, M. de Laroquette has found that only prolonged or direct exposure to sunlight destroys bacteria, and that its action is chiefly confined to dry surfaces where the bacteria are fully desiccated. Bacteria in liquids are affected only by very intense light, and this only at slight depth. White light is more effective than colored, blue being slightly more powerful than other colors. Bacteria are chiefly killed by luminous rays, and ultra-violet rays have failed to show the bactericidal action so generally credited them, the ultra-red also being inefficient. At best, sunlight acts only at the surface, while layers of fat or muscle prevent even the slight ordinary penetration.
