Boile Down Logic

No truer words were ever spoken than by old P. T. Barnum when he said the people liked to be humbugged. Just why they like to be humbugged is not apparent unless it be true that a sucker is born every minute, most of them twins and none ever die. Start any kind of a fool fad and the fooler it is the more people will run after it, join it and give up money for it. Every once in a while some alleged new Christ or Messiah come along and starts up a new religious cult, has his followers wear long hair, eat nothing but dried prunes and baled hay, and run around in dew-bespangled fields by moonlight with nothing on but a gee-string, and the first thing you know the mut has all their money and has skipped to Timbucktoo with the prettiest and plumpest blonde in the bunch leaving the rest with nothing but poverty, experience and a woe begone look.

If you, dear reader, should get out some handbills tomorrow, printed in red, yellow and green ink, advertising that you had secured a tabernacle for a grand mass meeting next Sunday night as the cock crowed and the bells tolled the midnight hour and the graves gave up their dead, and would appear then and there dressed only in a cloak of righteousness and elucidate to the multitude of deluded and miserable sinners of this mundane sphere a plan which the angel of the Lord had come down off of Mount Lassen in a combination automobile and aeroplane of fire out of the eruptive crater and whispered into your ample ear, there would not be room in the building to hold the tarnation idiots who would show up, and when you passed the hat for the purpose of buying new tires for the angel's snorting juggernaut of flame you'd get more coin than by editing this great family newspaper for a year, unless the police or someone with a grain of sense put in an appearance and ran you into the nut factory.
