

City adopts media policy

By CRAIG MURPHY
Of the Keizertimes

How, exactly, do you define the news media?

That was a question city of Keizer staff looked at recently, particularly in regards to news media attendance at executive sessions.

The issue came up in December, when Keizerite Eamon Bishop asked for permission to attend a Dec. 7 Keizer City Council executive session. Bishop claimed he was starting up a newspaper and was thus allowed to attend the session as a media member.

City Attorney Shannon Johnson met Bishop at the door and explained he hadn't had time to research the topic, since the request came shortly before the meeting. Bishop left and did not attend the regular council meeting that evening, nor did he attend the Jan. 4 council meeting. A copy of his newspaper has not been seen yet, either.

Still, bringing up the issue led Johnson to put together a policy for news media. He used Salem's policy as a model and also got input from others in Keizer before presenting his recommended policy at last week's council meeting.

As defined by state law, representatives of the news media are allowed to attend certain executive sessions but can be required to not disclose specified information discussed during the sessions.

There are 10 print media, eight radio media and nine television media organizations recognized by the city, though only the Keizertimes has been in attendance at executive sessions for several years.

"Most times news media are allowed to attend," Johnson said. "It would be appropriate to have a policy."

Among other things, the city's new policy makes it clear no recording is permitted of executive sessions except for the city's official recording.

Councilor Amy Ryan asked about the future.

"Is there a clause that allows changes in the future if another media source wanted to be considered?" Ryan asked. "I understand the list, but it could change in the future."

Johnson said there is a process for such new recognition. Mayor Cathy Clark liked the policy.

"It allows us an appropriate review of news outlets," Clark said. "We have seen news outlets change drastically in the last 10 years."

Councilor Roland Herrera asked about bloggers.

"Do you see bloggers being put on the list?" Herrera asked.

Johnson said anyone would have to meet a high level.

"I don't know at what level a blogger would qualify," Johnson said. "It has to be an entity serious about creating news in Keizer. That would be a difficulty with a random blogger. There has to be some frequency of publication, an institutionalized entity."

Councilors adopted the policy unanimously.

HEALY, continued from Page A1

Failing to appear in court is not a new thing, as his past history is filled with such marks. Being in trouble with the law is far from a new thing as well for Healy. A look at Healy's name in the system reveals more than two dozen records, starting with a 1987 infraction for defective equipment in Clackamas County.

Many of the records deal with suspended license or other driving issues, while a 1989 case dealt with possession of a controlled substance and unlawful possession of a firearm. He was first convicted for a theft charge in 1991, with another conviction for possession of a controlled substance in 1995.

Healy was convicted of burglary in 2002, with a criminal mischief and another burglary conviction the following year. A reckless driving conviction followed in 2007, with a conviction for possession of methamphetamine following in February 2008. That was the last case listed in the state court database until the 2013 laundromat charges.
