Artist wants to carve city hall poles

By CRAIG MURPHY
Of the Keizertimes

Perhaps you've noticed the two tall trees in front of the Keizer Civic Center.

A couple of years ago they got limbed, with the idea of two "story poles" being put in their place in 2017. The trees are a visual reference for what the project will look like when done.

As envisioned by members of the Keizer Public Arts Commission, one pole would be done by a Native American tribe, with the other pole done by a non-tribal group. Lore Christopher wants the trees left up, in hopes of an artist being intrigued.

Thus, Christopher was dancing - literally - at the most recent KPAC meeting when she heard an update from Nate Brown, director of Community Development for Keizer.

"We were contacted by a chainsaw artist," Brown said of artist David Hillesland. "This is not someone willing to just donate his work. He saw the two poles and he said it was perfect. They would be carved in place."

It was at this point Christopher got up and danced.

"Are you kidding me?" Christopher asked. "He will do the two in place? Excuse me? How much crap have I taken for saying we should leave the poles up? Maybe the tribal contribution is they do the design work and he does it with his chainsaw. I'm so excited."

Brown acknowledged Christopher has taken some grief for her stance, since it's been agreed the tree poles aren't healthy enough to stay up much longer.

"However, you're missing a major point," Brown said. "He is not donating them. They will cost between $1,000 and $10,000 each."

Christopher and Brown both emphasized plans are in the preliminary stages.

"We're not making an announcement," Brown said. "There are a lot of details to work through. There are funding sources to identify. There is a lot of mileage still to go."

Christopher noted the work will be done next year.

"This gives us another alternative," she said. "We were talking about having to spend $25,000. We just didn't know if we would have anyone come forward. It's exciting to know we have artists interested."

Rick Day cautioned the poles won't last forever.

"You will lose them under the ground eventually," Day said. "I'm suggesting you will have to protect the heck out of them. They will eventually rot out below."

Brown acknowledged the poles won't last forever.

"If we protect the top, the bottom is pretty rot resistant," he said. "They will eventually have to be preserved in another way, but that is many years down the road."

Christopher once again repeated her point.

"We wouldn't have this in front of us if we didn't have these poles out front," she said. "This gentleman drove by. Carousel Carvers said they might be interested. The Grand Ronde tribe said they might be interested as well. Everyone loves the project."

Brown emphasized again this week plans are preliminary.

"There's no design, no specifics, just a private individual who wants us to commission him," Brown said.
