hours of operation (6 a.m. to 11 p.m.). Signage on trucks and carts will not count as signage.

• More than two mobile food vendors on a single site will be classified as a pod and trigger other regulations. Pods will need to have a covered dining area as well as restroom facilities.

• Vendors will be free to operate on any site zoned for mixed commercial usage provided they: do not impede right-of-ways; are located on improved lots with paved surfaces; and have adequate parking.

• No separation requirement between brick-mortar restaurants and where mobile food vendors can set down stakes.

Councilor Bruce Anderson questioned where a vendor who sets up shop at Whiteaker Middle School during soccer season would fall under the new plans.

Brown said the rules are designed to continue allowing vendors to operate under 90-day permit if they choose.

Vendors who set up during special events at city parks could also take advantage of the 90-day permit and sidestep the pod requirements in those instances.

In response to a question from City Manager Chris Eppley about how appropriate sites would be determined, Brown said, "They won't have free reign (to set up anywhere), we will have looked at the location and approved it for mobile food vendor use."

Mayor Cathy Clark expressed concern about waste disposal, an issue discussed at length during planning commission meetings, but the proposed rules stress that vendors must comply with all environmental regulations - i.e. no dumping of waste water or grease into storm drains.

"It's a real problem, but it's a problem with existing businesses. On the other hand, people have to come to our counter and there will be an education opportunity," said Shannon Johnson, Keizer city attorney.

Council members will vote on the new ordinances covering mobile food vendors at a future council meeting.
