Citing censorship, council denies fast pass for 'trusted' art exhibitors

By ERIC A. HOWALD
Of the Keizertimes

There will not be a trusted vendor program for organization hoping to display work in the Keizer Civic Center. At least not yet.

Lore Christopher of the Keizer's Public Arts Commission (KPAC) presented the Keizer City Council with a plan to expedite approval of artwork from organizations with regular exhibits at Keizer Civic Center.

The request was met with trepidation by members of the city council who opted to tread carefully around any matter that would draw it or city employees into regulating the content of artwork destined for display in the civic center.

"We went through this conversation when the art commission was established to keep the council and city out of content regulation. We want to protect the freedom of speech and make sure that everyone is granted the fairness of a process," said Mayor Cathy Clark in voicing her opposition to the program.

The primary beneficiaries of the plan would have been the Salem-Keizer Education Foundation (SKEF) and the Colored Pencil Society of America. Both groups have had exhibits in the civic center in the past, but the Colored Pencil Society said the amount of work required to organize the show and get all the artwork approved for exhibition took too much time on behalf of its volunteer coordinators.

Christopher said KPAC was willing to compromise by instituting the preferred vendor program as a pilot project for two years and limiting it to the two named vendors instead of the three originally envisioned by KPAC.

KPAC commissioners had hoped to ease the burden on exhibitors like the Colored Pencil Society through a trusted vendor program that would have allowed it to submit an exhibit without having every single piece approved by the commission in advance.

City Attorney Shannon Johnson strongly opposed the implementation of such a plan in memo submitted to the council.

Johnson cited concerns about artwork being submitted through trusted vendors that could be deemed explicit or simply not appropriate for a public setting. Without pre-approval, he suggested, a process would need to be established for removing objectionable pieces and that could trigger questions regarding the fairness of the process.

Christopher tried to counter Johnson's concern stating that two KPAC members would be on-hand during art intake to reject any pieces deemed unsuitable. That however didn't pass muster with Councilor Roland Herrera.

"Deciding last minute doesn't play well for me. I feel like we can come up with a better solution," he said.

Johnson also suggested that other vendors would be able to claim city standards as a whole were unfair if the council wasn't approving an actual process. They were instead being asked to support a concept with a process to follow after approval.

As a last ditch concession, Christopher asked the council to approve the program for at least SKEF because artwork was already passing through gatekeepers at the school level. However, if that were to be approved at some later date, Clark wanted to see it opened up to all education entities.

That proposal met with resistance from Nate Brown, Keizer's community development director.

"The only reason SKEF has been given that latitude is because of the extreme oversight. I would caution that smaller organizations would not have that oversight, and I would want to make sure that was in place," Brown said.

The total value of an exhibit is also something kept in check with the existing process. Under the city's current insurance policy, no individual piece of artwork can be valued at more than $3,000, and an entire exhibit cannot be valued at more than $50,000. Without pre-approval, exhibitors would have to be held accountable for the values of each individual piece so as not to run afoul of insurance limits.

Christopher said the KPAC members present at intake would take responsibility for the valuation, but that seemed to be the least of the council's concerns before approving a pilot program.

"I am a little reluctant to move forward without seeing the policy we are approving," said Councilor Bruce Anderson.

Johnson recommended keeping the current process in place while city staff worked with members of KPAC to resolve any issues brought forth by vendors. In the end, that's the path the council took.

MCSO looking for a few good cadets

The Marion County Sheriff's Office is recruiting for its Cadet Program. The program introduces cadets to what it takes to be a patrol deputy, parole and probation deputy or corrections deputy.

To join the Cadet Program, a person must be between 14.5 and 20 years old, and they must be enrolled full time in school. They must also have a 2.5 grade point average.

Cadets learn about teamwork and develop leadership skills while being mentored by deputies. Individuals who are selected will participate in an interview process and must pass a background investigation. Successful applicants will begin an eight-week cadet academy starting in January.

The classes will be held on Sundays. Applications are due Oct. 14 by 5 p.m.

Once trained, individuals will ride along with deputies on patrol, participate in community relations programs, assist with traffic control and security, and learn more about the professions associated with the field of law enforcement. The cadets will be expected to dedicate 20 hours of volunteer work each month.

For more information, go to www.GoMcsO.com and click on the Cadet Unit link for an application.

GRASSROOTS GOVERNMENT

The Keizer Traffic Safety, Bikeways and Pedestrian Committee had its most recent meeting Thursday, Aug. 11. Here's what was discussed:

- Chair Hersch Sangster suggested the development of more bike ride routes that could be posted to the city's website. He volunteered to redesign an existing ride route and suggested that 'kid rides,' 'neighborhood cruiser rides' and longer recreational rides be developed and posted as well. Existing routes can be accessed at www.keizer.org/Bike-Routes/.
- Committee member Pat Fisher suggested look-
