

GRASSROOTS GOVERNMENT

The Keizer Planning Commission held its latest meeting Wednesday, June 14, here's what was discussed:

• Most of the meeting was devoted to updating the city's off-street parking and loading code. Commissioners resolved a conflict in the code regarding theaters, which previously fell under two different requirements for parking. The existing code states theaters can have either one parking space for every four seats or one space for every three seats. The change requires one space for every three seats. Other changes approved included standardized spaces for parallel parking, standardized aisle widths for parking lots, ranging from 14 feet to 22 feet depending on the angle of parking, and requirements for one tree for every eight parking spaces in large parking lots. The issue of aisle widths caused the most consternation on the part of the commissioners. Several cited difficulties encountered in the Keizer Village Shopping Center (where Goodwill is located) as a problem they wanted to avoid in the future. "It was built at a time when standards were different, and it was built to the bare minimum. There are more restaurants there now and more intense usage for quick trips," said Shane Witham, assistant city planner. • Community Development Director Nate Brown reported on construction of the new hotel in Keizer Station, which has been stalled for months. A new contractor is on board and plans to resume work in July, Brown said.
