Today in History

President Abraham Lincoln issues a preliminary Emancipation Proclamation, which sets a date for the freedom of more than 3 million black slaves in the United States and recasts the Civil War as a fight against slavery. Lincoln maintained that the war was about restoring the Union and not about slavery. He avoided issuing an anti-slavery proclamation immediately, despite the urgings of abolitionists and radical Republicans, as well as his personal belief that slavery was morally repugnant.

Food 4 Thought

"America will never be destroyed from the outside. If we falter and lose our freedoms, it will be because we destroyed ourselves."

— President Abraham Lincoln

Texas fugitive cuffed in Keizer

Man is charged with murder

By ERIC A. HOWALD
Of the Keizertimes

A man accused of murder in Texas, who fled the state after being released on bond last year, was arrested in Keizer Tuesday, Sept. 12.

U.S. Marshals arrested Jonathan Green in the 600 block of Greenwood Drive Northeast without incident as he left the residence.

Deputy U.S. Marshal Eric Wahlstrom said he did not know why he was staying here, but investigations led marshals to believe he'd ended up in the Salem-Keizer area.

Wahlstrom said the Pacific

Northwest Violent Offender Task Force had been investigating Green's whereabouts for a few weeks before going public with an announcement on a Portland news broadcast.

"We don't always like to put it out that we are looking for someone, but it was the right call in this case. Sure enough a viewer spotted him and we ultimately found him on Greenwood Drive," Wahlstrom said.

Green was arrested in connection with the death of 20-year-old Jehlan Vaughn in March 2016. Vaughn, an up-and-coming dancer, in Houston, Texas, was shot in his apartment and the suspect fled the scene. Green was later arrested and charged with the crime.

J. Green

"He was out on bond pending trial and they had him on electronic monitoring (in September 2016)," Wahlstrom said.

It is believed Green cut off his ankle monitor and fled. He did not show up for court appearances in September 2016 and his attorney petitioned the court to remove her from the case citing lack of contact and payment.

Wahlstrom was not certain what led Green to Oregon or if he knew anyone in the area. The U.S. Marshals, who specialize in fugitive apprehension, took up the case after investigations in Houston went cold.

"The resources it takes to find people are enormous. You have to have equipment for surveillance and we kind of have a dedicated team that has the time to focus on these types of cases," Wahlstrom said.

Green was taken to the Marion County Correction Facility where he was being held without bail.

The victim in the murder, Vaughn, was remembered by one of his former teachers on the website for his high school newspaper as a gifted dancer.

"For him, dancing was like breathing air. It was who he was, what he was, how he was, and why he was," wrote Sharon Roberts. "You didn't just see Jehlan dance ... you felt it. You felt it and you remembered it"

Council walking back previous decision on development fee

By ERIC A. HOWALD
Of the Keizertimes

New information and additional public testimony have the Keizer City Council rethinking its stance on plans to enact a fee to create public amenities in association with new commercial development projects.

At a council meeting Monday, Sept. 12, councilors were preparing to act on amendments to the city development code that included requirements that: 1) any development or interior remodel worth more than $100,000 would require bringing landscaping up to code and 2) that any new development or remodel of a business of any amount would dedicate one percent of the total cost to creation of public amenities either on the site of the business or by paying the 1 percent into a fund for public art. (Editor's note: Due to a reporter error, Keizertimes previously reported that the 1 percent fee would only kick in for projects worth more than $100,000. We apologize for the misinformation.)

The end result of discussions at the meeting was to continue the matter at the council's October 2 meeting and reopen the public hearing.

City staff had already prepared an ordinance for the council to approve and the public comment period had already passed, but Jonathan Thompson, a board member of the Keizer Chamber of Commerce was granted the opportunity to speak on the issue.

"We are concerned with increasing regulation and another fee. Let's get some folks around the table and try to do more with a carrot and less with the stick," Thompson said.

After hearing from Thompson, the council asked if anyone else wanted to speak on the issue and Alan Roodhouse, one of the developers behind Keizer Station, took the mic. Roodhouse was in attendance to answer questions about another council action, but the new fee would affect a project of his in the works — a new dental office near Kaiser Permanente in Keizer Station.

Roodhouse compared the construction of Target when Keizer Station opened to the construction of the new dental building. Despite having a smaller footprint, the dental office will cost more to construct because it is a specialized facility. The final cost of the construction is expected to be in the range of $6 to $8 million, 1 percent of which is $60,000 to $80,000.

"(The fee) will have a much higher impact to smaller businesses with higher costs of entry," Roodhouse said. "Maybe it could be addressed with some sort of total cap."

To further complicate the matter, only three city councilors and the mayor were in attendance and not privy to the new information, which was one reason a final vote on the code amendments were tabled.

Community Development Director Nate Brown made one final pitch for the idea before the conversations started heading toward the delay.

"We have tried to make this non-punitive. We don't want to put undue burden on small business, but that's why the 1 percent is so low. It's not a lot of money. It's also extremely flexible. We will work with the developers and be creative in how we get the amenities oriented toward the community," Brown said.

He later added that if the city is serious about an overall vision for River Road, or the community at large, the fee is one way to extract the money needed to pay for such projects.

Clark said Roodhouse's testimony was the one that made her question her original stance on the fee.

"A medical office and a regular office will have dramatically different costs, and that's not something I had considered," Clark said.

Brown said they were looking for the fairest way to levy the fee and attaching it to the cost of development was the one thing the city has access to. Attaching it to profits generated at each site would require access to businesses' tax returns.

Councilor Amy Ryan, who opposed the changes at earlier meetings, said, "It's not businesses' responsibility to invest more into the community when they are already choosing Keizer."

The recommendation for the changes came through the Keizer Planning Commission, which includes present and former business owners. Councilor Laura Reid voiced concern about overriding their judgment.

"I am in favor of further discussion, but I want to respect the work the planning commission has done. There are costs of doing business and we have lower costs in many respects. I think public amenities are an important cost of doing business in Keizer," Reid said.
