DEQ responds to public comments on dirt move

By ERIC A. HOWALD
Of the Keizertimes

The Oregon Department of Environmental Quality has responded to concerns regarding the potential trucking of contaminated dirt through Keizer.

From July 1 through Aug. 14, DEQ officials asked for public comment on the movement of dieldrin-tainted dirt from a development site in northeast Salem through Keizer to abandoned quarries northwest of Keizer.

Dieldrin is an insecticide developed as an alternative to DDT in the 1940s. It was used primarily on fruit, soil and seed. The U.S. Department of agriculture banned use of dieldrin in 1970, but it is a legacy pollutant that remains in the environment long after being introduced.

The planned path will take an estimated 14,000 truckloads of dirt past four schools, but after testing and observation by DEQ toxicologists, the risks appear to be low.

Excavation has already started on part of the development site – which will become an estimated 500 homes along with duplexes and apartments – and DEQ officials monitored air samples while the dirt was being moved. Dieldrin was not detected in any of the samples.

Anderson Geologic, the environmental consultant on the project, has called for temporary roadways to be constructed to minimize disturbance while the dirt is loaded and all trucks will be inspected as they leave the site with loose dirt being removed.

When as little as a pound of dieldrin enters the environment, the federal government's National Response Center (NRC) must be notified immediately.

In response to questions about the impact of so many heavy trucks traveling the same route, DEQ officials said those issues would have to be taken up with local jurisdictions, like city and county governments.

To control dust en route to the quarries, the DEQ response is that the soil will be wetted down prior to travel and then trucks will be cleaned at the quarry site before returning to Salem.

Regarding why the soil has been labeled as “clean fill for farm use” despite the contamination, the DEQ responded that a residential gardener would come into contact with the soil much more frequently than a farmer on a tractor plowing a few times a year. Once moved to the quarry, the dirt will be used for hazelnut orchards, which the Oregon Department of Agriculture said poses less concern for food contamination. Crops grown in or closer to the soil, such as pumpkin, squash, zucchini or carrots, would be more problematic.

Review by hydrogeologists and licensed geologists determined that there was no potential for groundwater contamination because dieldrin binds tightly to soil.

“If (dieldrin) were soluble, it would have washed out of the soil and no longer be present,” the report stated.

While the process is moving forward, Nancy Sawka, a senior project manager with DEQ, said permits still need to be obtained from Marion County and the Oregon Department of State Lands. The Army Corps of Engineers may also need to issue a permit because one of the quarries is considered wetlands.

Congressional inaction threatens at-risk youth

By ERIC A. HOWALD
Of the Keizertimes

A statewide advocacy group mobilized a notable selection of local supporters in Salem to call on the U.S. Congress to reauthorize and expand two federal programs that deter crime through early intervention.

Keizer Police Chief John Teague, Salem Police Chief Jerry Moore, and Polk County District Attorney Aaron Felton were all called on to speak on behalf of the Maternal, Infant, Early Childhood Home Visiting Act (MIECHV) and the Children's Health Insurance Program (CHIP). The trio met with Martha Brooks of Fight Crime: Invest in Kids and Patricia Altenhofen, executive director of Family Building Blocks, Monday, Oct. 2 for a press conference.

Funding for the two programs expired Sept. 30 and will need to be reauthorized by Congress or local families might lose resources viewed as critical by law enforcement and justice officials.

“As a cop, when we can teach families how to raise kids well, it makes kids safer, it makes children, families and the community more productive, and it decreases crime. I am sincerely hopeful that Congress will reappropriate funds for these programs,” Teague said.

Teague spoke specifically to programs funded through MIECHV, which pays for low-income, new parents to be screened and arrange for voluntary in-home visits after the birth of their children.

“There are some basic things these families just don't know because they have generations of uninformed parenting,” Teague said.

Altenhofen said Family Building Blocks has about 40 home visitors and eight of them are funded through MIECHV appropriations. Statewide, MIECHV funds have directed about $20 to $30 million into Oregon for such services.

Parents who enroll in the program are screened at the hospital, sometimes even prenatally, and offered in-home visits. In-home visits can cover a wide variety of topics ranging from safety issues to something as seemingly instinctual as making eye contact.

“The tiny changes create attachments for the child and supports development,” Altenhofen said.

Parents in the program can receive visits for the first three years of the child's life if they wish.

Funding is the primary barrier to offering the program to more eligible families, Altenhofen added.

“About a year ago, we screened as many new parents as we could for a month and discovered that we're serving 1-in-4 families that could benefit from this program. Only about 25 percent,” Altenhofen said.

Moore spoke on the issue of CHIP funding and its role in reducing police responses to mental health crises. CHIP coverage provides specific funding for functional family therapy that has been proven to cut rearrests in half and multi-systemic therapy, which has been shown to cut violent felony arrests by 75 percent.

“These are problems that, if not treated, continue into adult life. On a daily basis, (police) contact adults with mental health issues and these programs reduce those problems,” Moore said.

Brooks said CHIP was on the agenda for the finance committee this week, but there were no clear assurances of reauthorization. The U.S. House of Representatives passed a version of MIECHV authorization that requires a state match, but the U.S. Senate has yet to bring forth its version of the bill.

Oregon receives about $100,000 in federal funding for CHIP and it serves approximately 3,000 kids.

“The critical piece is getting that funding so that we don't lose home visitors that go to other jobs and then the families drop off,” Brooks said.

Fritz Graham, of Sen. Ron Wyden's office, sat in on the presser. Wyden is the ranking member on the Senate Finance Committee, but Brooks also urged Rep. Greg Walden to prioritize the reappropriation as chair of the House Energy and Commerce Committee.

“These programs support at-risk parents who are trying to do their best, but don't always know how to support their kids so that they can succeed. The research is on our side and shows the profound impacts these programs have,” said Felton.

Toothy evidence unmasks tree vandal in Keizer yard
Upset about an apple tree someone cut down in his back yard, McNary Estates homeowner Arthur Hamlin called police last week to file a report. “I thought someone had used an axe to cut it down,” he said. A Keizer police investigation into the unusual crime, however, determined that the tree had not been chopped down -- it had been chomped down. The vicious culprit? A beaver.
