and they've really come out and supported us," said Kalugin.

'We were surprised from the first day," added Hammad. 'We were worried, but we've had five-star reviews all over."

When Keizertimes first stopped in to talk with the owners on a Monday afternoon, the restaurant was so busy and packed that we postponed the talk for later in the week. When we returned on a brief respite three days later, Hammad and Kalugin were looking through a local home guide for available properties in Keizer.

'We like this community and we're going to try to buy a house here," Hammad said.

Kalugin had been pressuring Hammad to look into expansion in the Salem area.

"I knew they didn't have much of anything here and I told him we needed to expand to the Salem area," said Kalugin.

It was Kamis's desire for a restaurant to call her own that finally moved the needle. Kamis championed a Keizer locale over Salem.

When Kamis was ready, the transition began quickly.
