

REID, continued from Page A1

on the Way to the Apocalypse emerged in the year following Reid's graduation from Brigham Young University with a degree in history. Four years of dry historical research had turned him on to trying to find the funny in the mundane and incorporate that into his essays.

After four years of research writing, Reid wanted to do something different.

"When you write something that is about after the end of the world, you don't really have to do much research about the world as it is," he said.

Since graduating from BYU with a history degree, Reid has explored a few career paths, but hasn't yet settled on a good fit.

"I am not very good at enforcing rules, and that's also one of the reasons I wanted to make [the book] a comedy, because there's so many literary rules. I didn't really want to adhere to those all the time. If there's an instance where using wrong grammar or punctuation or something would make it funnier, I'd do it even if it was breaking the rules."

Reid would like to write professionally, but acknowledges the difficulty of making a career as a novelist.

"I would love to make writing a career, but I don't expect it to happen. I'd be thrilled if it happened and I look for opportunities to advance that. Before I self-published I was looking at agents and stuff like that, and that's something I continue to be doing," Reid said, "It's my dream, but I'm also a realist."

Right now, he's working for a temp agency, trying to find a job that's the right fit. He hopes to find a career that allows time for writing on the side. He's working on a sequel to A Funny Thing Happened on the Way to the Apocalypse, and ultimately imagines a trilogy.

Reid's goal in writing novels is to provide a moment of escapism in a world that feels on the verge of apocalypse.

"In today's climate, with all the uncertainty—climate change, and talk of politics everywhere—it's important to get into something light-hearted. I hope my book is a bit of escapism for people. The best escapism is the stuff that makes people laugh," Reid said.

But there's something in the writing process for Reid, too. Fiction writing is an outlet for a self-proclaimed introvert who sometimes struggles to find the right words in person-to-person interactions. Fiction is Reid's way of expressing the person he'd like to be.

"I'm much better at expressing myself in writing than I am through speaking. I stutter a lot, I get nervous talking to people, and I have a hard time coming up with jokes on the spot," Reid said.

He added: "In a way I envy those characters because they have someone writing for them."

KLL: Council will consider task force creation Aug. 20

(Continued from Page A1) facility, and assemble representatives of current youth sports participants and the community to help determine how the park will be managed in the future.

"Ultimately, the objective is framework for how the volunteer organizations that run and use the park can best be supported by the city and community for long term success. Success, in my mind, is the park is safe, consistently maintained, improved through planned projects, and a welcoming place for people to play for years to come," Clark said in an email.

The history of KLL Park is storied, but there have been several bumps in the road dating back a decade. A small army of community volunteers linked arms and brought the park into existence almost four decades ago, but a schism in the youth sports leagues in 2008 has made management of the facility a contentious issue. Until that point, the KLL organization had managed the park.

The schism birthed KYSA while Keizer Little League continued to operate on a parallel track. KYSA was then given the contract to manage the facility, but by the end of its tenure, in 2014, the park had fallen into serious disrepair. After the city balked at providing funding to restore the park, KLL was again given the contract. KYSA ended its tenure as park managers and members of its leadership took with them several pieces of valuable equipment they maintained belonged to them — including some items that predated their contract for management.

KLL's latest tenure as manager has seen the park largely restored through grants and private donations, but the organization was asked three times in the past year for a detailed budget that was only produced with the assistance of city staff. When the budget was finally released last month, it turned out KLL owed the park complex more than $28,000 in concession revenues and field usage fees.

The city council forgave the concession debt in exchange for payment of the usage fees and have since retroactively amended KLL's contract allowing the organization to keep half of the concession revenues.
