

HARVEST: 'More than any other ... Salem Harvest lives its values'

"We're at 175 harvests this season and we'll probably do about 220 this year," said Executive Director Elise Bauman. "Our cost is 16 cents a pound, which is the lowest in the nation, I think. It costs MPFS about $1 per pound to bring other food to the food bank."

Bauman interrupts the conversation to advise a young volunteer struggling to pull a pear from a tree.

"If you pull down, the tree doesn't want to give up, but if you lift up past 90 degrees it comes right off," she says, demonstrating the technique. "Those are Bosc pears you're picking. Remember that. Knowledge is power."

food available and making connections with potential sources.

"I feel like I'm a good connection between the average person and the agriculture here in Marion County. One of the things I'm trying to get out there this year is for people to stop taking hazelnuts they see on the ground in orchards thinking they are going to waste. Hazelnuts aren't harvested until they hit the ground," she said.

About 1,000 volunteers participate in harvests each year. Regardless of the crop, harvesters are asked to donate half of what they pick to MPFS or another organization of its type, the other half they can keep for themselves or their families. A sizable portion of the pear yield – in excess of the 3,400 pounds for MPFS – on Saturday, Sept. 15, went to the food pantry at Willamette University for students who need assistance. Hundreds of additional pounds went home with volunteers.

"Other volunteers that we have a lot of success with are older folks or early retirees who don't have daytime commitments and can come out and harvest with us," Bauman said.

If at all possible, Bauman tries to keep harvest to two hours a pop, the reasons are both psychological and biological.

"Two hours was a reasonable amount of time for the harvest leaders who put in extra time before and after we start picking. For the pickers, the two hour mark seems to be when they stop having fun. The other thing is the bathroom issue. Sometimes we don't have a restroom and sometimes we do, and anybody can hold it for two hours," she said.

Aside from helping harvest, it's the harvest leaders' job to make sure everyone is comfortable with the tasks at hand and to act as a caretaker for the orchards and fields themselves.

"We are taking groups onto other peoples' property and we want to make sure everyone respects that. We don't want to leave behind a bunch of trees with broken branches," Fuhrman said.

Bauman herself started as a volunteer harvester in 2011.

"I needed food to feed my family. At the time, there were five kids and one income. It just wasn't cutting it and there's pride around not taking food stamps or those sort of things," Bauman said.

Some of the harvesters picking pears are doing so to help feed their families, but others are there for the exercise or simply as an act of communal support. Recently, Bauman made time in her schedule to sit in on a meeting of Keizer United, a networking group for area non-profit efforts. While there, she made contact with the director of Simonka Place, a women's shelter on River Road North. A few weeks later, a group of residents was out picking blueberries with Salem Harvest.

"They took back about 250 pounds to the shelter," Bauman said. "It's a good use of their time and our time because they don't have to get it from MPFS."

The short time it takes in getting food from field to food bank is one of the primary benefits of having a local organization like Salem Harvest. Reducing the window in which spoilage can occur means more ready-to-eat produce and nuts.

Even though much of each harvest goes to the food share, volunteer pickers find other ways to share the bounty. Fuhrman lives in Silverton and portions of what she takes home goes to three different community dinners and others go to a group of women who make soup for local warming centers.

"All of the gleaners who come back find others ways to share the food we rescue and the web keeps getting bigger," Fuhrman said. "More than any other organization I've ever seen, Salem Harvest lives its values."

#HarvestATV

The night before a Keizertimes reporter ventured out to talk with Salem Harvest volunteers, a thief hot wired and stole the group's four-wheeler.

The all-terrain vehicle (ATV) was one of the first purchases Salem Harvest made as a non-profit and will only be more essential to the task of rescuing food as the seasons change.

"We'll be out harvesting squash in a few weeks and the crops only get heavier as the year goes on," said Jaime Fuhrman, a harvest leader.

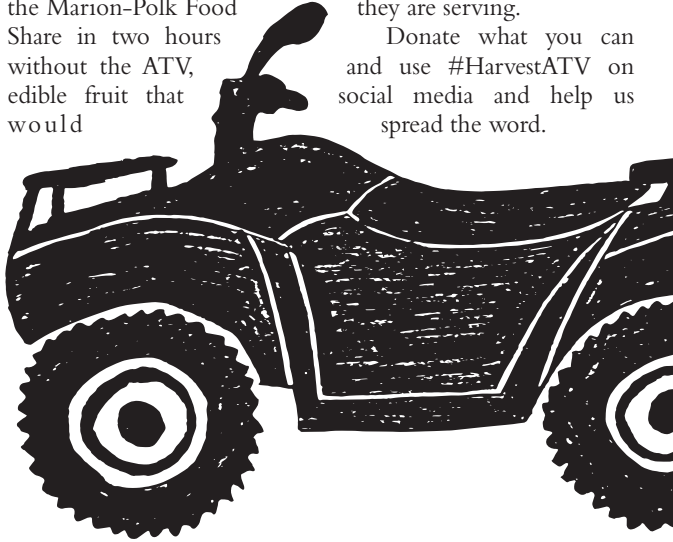

The ATV, which can move easily among the rows of an orchard or traverse large fields quickly, is primarily used to haul harvested crops back to the Salem Harvest truck. While the vehicle was unsecured, whoever took it had to know precisely what they were after. The ATV was parked at least a half-mile away from passing traffic and surrounded by trees.

The ATV was insured, but we think Keizer and Salem can do better. This week, Keizertimes has donated $100 to Salem Harvest through its website, www.salemharvest.org, and we're putting out a challenge to the rest of the community: donate what you can.

Enough donations of $5 and $10 add up quickly and the value of the services Salem Harvest is providing cannot be overstated. Volunteer harvesters rescued more than 3,400 pounds of pears for the Marion-Polk Food Share in two hours without the ATV, edible fruit that would most likely have rotted or become food for passing deer. Anything we can do to make the Salem Harvest task easier is the very least they should expect from the community they are serving.

Donate what you can and use #HarvestATV on social media and help us spread the word.
