GROW,

multifamily housing with generally less than 10 units. The underlying assumption is that this type of housing will take the pressure off the single-family residences Keizer is known for and provide a greater mix of housing types to meet the needs of all potential residents. If nothing is done, residents can expect more of the same, e.g. the average sale price of a single-family home jumping 11 percent ($27,000) as it did between 2016 and 2018.

To meet the expected increase of 10,000 new residents over the next 20 years, Keizer will need to move quickly and will likely be doing so facing headwinds in the development market. Right now, there isn't much incentive for private property owners to redevelop existing residential or commercial properties. Creating incentives – like improved streetscapes and new, shared open spaces – to foster such development will most likely fall to the city and all of its resident taxpayers. And it won't be accomplished with the existing ultra-low local property tax rate.

The other option is seeking to expand the city limits. That is a proposition much easier said than done and comes with a whole different set of costs. Just getting to the point of expanding the city boundaries could cost upward of $1 million, but it won't stop there. Adding new land to Keizer will mean every bit of infrastructure – sewers, streets, electricity and more – must be extended into the new areas. At a minimum, Keizer would be looking at an investment of $40,000 per home. Those added costs that could well “price out” the city's current residents from ever moving to homes in the new areas. Costs aside, expanding the city limits is a viable option, but ask yourself if you want the decision made for you.

As much as this conversation affects current residents, its outcomes will affect future generations. If you are one of those residents hoping to keep your family geographically close, the decisions reached through this process are just as important. As proud as Keizerites are of being a one-high-school-town, the graduates of McNary aren't coming back to live here as frequently as they once did.

It may be because they can't find a home in the right price range and it may be the lack of “things to do.” It's probably both, but creating a mix of lifestyle opportunities will only add to the small town feel and increase the diversity of options available to families in all stages of life.

We only include our voice on the front page of the paper when we believe it matters most. This conversation and decisions it will produce matter. We aren't advocating for one path or another. What we want is for you to get engaged and be part of shaping the future of this city. It's not sexy or scandalous, but it may be the most important conversation Keizer will have since declaring its independence almost 40 years ago.

and eliminates an opportunity to capture revenue that could pay for the continued upkeep of the civic center.

The memo offered three options: continue along the lines of Rotary's proposal, require that Rotary pay established usage rates or establish a new rate taking into account the work Rotary members perform in the community at large.

From the outset, councilors Roland Herrera and Marlene Parsons sided with Rotary members, many of whom were in attendance at the meeting.

“As I look out I see pillars of our community out here. I want us to consider that. There are four first citizens out here. They've put so much time in and I want us to keep that in mind,” Herrera said.

“I think the service they give is something you cannot put a price tag on,” Parsons added.

In the earlier letter, Rotary alleged that city staff said the projects the club backs fall into the area of “wants” rather than “needs.”

Mayor Cathy Clark said the wrangling over the types of projects Rotary backs in return for usage of the rooms is a matter of clearing lines of communication.

“I also think it's important to have the conversation about projects as they develop. If we can communicate early about projects you are interested we can determine where they fit in with the things we have in master plans,” Clark said.

Councilor Laura Reid said it wasn't simply a matter of waiving fees for a preferred group.

“I think it's important that we look at the nonprofits themselves and the work they do. This is not just a fiscal question, it's a matter of what Rotary does. We are trusting that Rotary will multiply this benefit and make it work in many ways throughout the community,” Reid said.

Members of Rotary, city staff members and Councilor Dan Kohler are working through the final details of the agreement.

LATINO: ‘An investment from people who believe in you’ that made a great difference in my life,” Dominguez said while addressing the 18 students. “The scholarship that you are receiving today is an investment from people who believe in you.”

The vision of the Latino Action Committee is to manifest Latino participation and representation with the goal of informing, encouraging and supporting Latinos at all levels and educational affairs, particularly in increasing graduation.

Herrera addressed some of the obstacles that Latinos face in American education, and was pleased that these Keizer kids were able to persevere.

“We all struggle to get through school, but when you have language barriers and economic and social barriers, it can be more difficult. But they never gave up,” Herrera said.

The awards and recognition were met with gratitude from the McNary students.

“It's a sweet honor to be able to get this scholarship so that I can go to school. I like that people are noticing and paying specific attention to Latinos in their community and helping us get to our dreams,” said Lorena Arellano Franco, who's attending Willamette University next year to major in biology.

“I am so thankful for these types of committees to help me reach my dreams. If I could be a part of this in the future, I'd gladly do it so that I could help others that are in my position.”

Dominguez was one of the special speakers at this event and concluded his presentation with three points: be a role model, be involved in the community and include God in your journey.

“I hope this will be a long standing memory that you will not forget,” Dominguez said. “Now, you are ready to launch out into the real world with God-given talents and abilities.”

“Be bold and be confident that you will succeed in the next steps of your journey ... I hope that this scholarship will give you a new sense of destiny.”

Keizer Mayor Cathy Clark also gave a brief speech of encouragement.

“We're investing in your future, but you're going to take that investment and you're going to do great things,” Clark said.

At the conclusion of the event, Clark shared with the audience that the LAC scholarship program was to be named after the Herrera family, specifically in honor Roland Herrera's brother, Ruben Castilla Herrera — who passed away earlier this year and was a beloved activist in Ohio that was involved with several social justice movements.

“It blew me away. I was so overwhelmed,” Herrera said. “My brother was an amazing activist. He had an impact on so many different communities.”

Video game tourney May 31 in Keizer

Satellite Gaming will host their Middle School eSports Tournament at 5 p.m. on Friday, May 31 at Claggett Creek Middle School.

Students can register to participate in tournaments, and the victors will be rewarded with gaming oriented gift cards. Players will also be able to engage in free play in the board game lounge, and will be given a raffle ticket, one soda and a slice of pizza from Moe's Pizza. The tournament games will be Fortnite, Super Smash Bros. and Rocket League.

The theme is Nerd Night and students are encouraged to express themselves by wearing their favorite nerd attire. The best dressed nerd will win a prize.

Workshops will also be available for parents and coffee will be provided by Human Bean. The workshops will present opportunities for parents to learn about Fortnite, screen time and scholarship opportunities in collegiate e-sports.

Pre-registration is required to compete in the tournament, and the entree fee is $5. Late registration after Tuesday, May 28 will be $10. To register or for more information about the visit satellitgaming.net.
