GAMING,

During the month of July, Juran has offered different classes for eager youngsters who want to learn about the technology that makes their favorite games work.

Earlier in the month, Juran held a Do-It-Yourself (DIY) retro gaming console class where students learned how to make their own home video game console, which they got to take home after the class was through. Students also learned about how to convert their old games into digital format so that they could play them on the system they created.

Last week (July 15-19), Juran taught a console repair class, instructing students about the basics of microelectronics diagnosis and repair. All the kids in the class got the opportunity to repair broken Wii gaming systems, and even could keep them if they were able to successfully repair the systems.

These classes gives curious kids the opportunity to dive

Looking back in the KT

5 YEARS AGO
Familiar face, new place
Former McNary High School teacher and coach Erik Jespersen has been tapped as the next Celtic principal.

10 YEARS AGO
Citizen vision is clean, green, unlimited growth
new high school gets thumbs down
What do Keizerites want from their community? According to a tentatively approved visioning statement prepared by a Portland consulting firm, desires include growing responsibly, keeping the volunteer spirit, more jobs, a green city with lots of recreational opportunities – and no new high school.

15 YEARS AGO
Library election delayed two years
The Keizer City Council agreed Monday to postpone a hoped-for fall election on a Keizer library plan, meaning voters won't see a library measure until 2006.

No criminal charges are likely to result from a recent raid by Keizer police on the local clubhouse of the Gypsy Jokers Motorcycle Club.

deep into the technical side of their hobby.

"I'm just a really techie guy and gaming is a huge hobby for me. I've been doing in my whole life," said 14-year old Aidan Fairbairn.

While Satellite Gaming is directly affiliated with a church, Juran confirmed that this wasn't a class that involved any religiosity. For him, teaching these classes is one of the ways he feels that he can serve the community.

"It's not a religious event, we're doing something great for our community because this is what are faith has driven us to. This is a religious organization that is doing something in the community because we feel compelled to,"

Juran said.

When he isn't volunteering with Satellite Gaming, Juran serves as a technical consultant for Northwest Evaluation Association. But working with youths through the avenue of video games is where Juran has really found his passion.

"We're offering a service that we think needs to be offered by reaching kids that aren't provided for with other opportunities. So for the kids that aren't into sports or music and would rather go home and play video games, those kids now have a community and other kids to enjoy that hobby with," Juran said.

Kevin Johnson, one of the directors at Satellite Gaming, also commented on how these classes could help kids towards a career path in game development

"These are skills that kids can take to careers in the future. One of the main focuses of Satellite Gaming is to bring gaming more to the forefront of society," he said.
