to reconsider the proposal and has tweeted out support for the Volcanoes organization in recent weeks.

In their conversation, Walker shared the on-field success of the Volcanoes and how they have produced multiple players that went onto win World Series titles with the San Francisco Giants. Walker also talked about how the team has met, and in some instances, exceeded facility requirements from the MLB and the possible economic impact losing the Volcanoes would mean for the city of Keizer.

According to Walker, nearly $1.5 million of upgrades, including three new buildings, have been added to Volcanoes Stadium since its construction in 1997.

"The Congressman was very interested and supportive. He asked insightful questions that showed he was well-versed on the issue," Walker said. "Schrader and I shared many common goals. We are community-first. We both believe in supporting local businesses and we recognize that Minor League Baseball is essential to the communities it represents."

But arguably the most meaningful part of Walker's trip came during the briefing/news conference that took place on Capitol Hill later in the day.

Four members of Congress — Lori Trahan (D-Mass.), David McKinley (R-W.Va) Rep. Max Rose (D-N.Y.) and

Rep. Max Simpson (R-Idaho) — banded together to form the bi-partisan Save Minor League Baseball Task Force, which plans to advocate for each community that stands to lose their minor league teams Trahan, McKinley, Rose and Simpson all represent districts that feature minor league organizations that would be on the chopping block if the MLB's proposal comes to fruition.

"The Save Minor League Baseball Task Force was one of the most meaningful and authentic shows of legislative support I have seen in my three decades as a professional baseball owner," Walker said. "The task force not only provided the national venue for the cause of saving the 42 affiliated minor league teams, it also allowed team owners, like ourselves, to share our commitment to local economies and community causes."

Along with receiving support from Congress, Volcanoes fans and former players from across the globe have voiced their displeasure with the MLB's proposal on saveourvolcanoes.com, a website where fans can sign a petition in support of the organization.

Justin Knoedler, who played for the Volcanoes in 2001 and now resides in Illinois, wrote on the site: "Great place to play, wonderful community and terrific ownership. There are several minor league ballparks that should be shut down, but this one should not be on the list."

Jeena Huntzinger from Dallas (OR) added: "The Volcanoes are a part of our community in Keizer. The players stay in our homes. The stadium has a picnic area for families during games. The owners pay tribute to our local businesses and charities. The Volcanoes matter a great deal to us. Don't take them away."

Swapping old and new-ish

On Saturday, Dec. 7, Faith Lutheran Church on River Road North hosted the area's first-ever Toy Swap.

In the weeks leading up to the event, area residents dropped off lightly used toys as part of an effort by Marion County Recycling to reduce waste.

Last weekend, all the donations were collected and offered for free. About two dozen visitors filled a community room at Faith Lutheran after the opening.
