about 20 percent as well in the coming year.

One of the biggest unknowns is how the stock market drop will affect the city's pay into the Public Employees Retirement System (PERS). Just a few weeks ago, Wood told the city's long-range planning committee that the bullish stock market might ease the city's load. On that day, March 9, the Dow Jones Industrial Average closed at 25,864 points. The market has since shed another 5,000 points.

Calling it a bright spot seems disingenuous, but Wood expects to see a bump in local taxes on cigarette and liquor sales. Keizer gets about .08 cents per gallon on beer and cider sales and .67 cents per gallon for wine.

"It's not a huge amount, but given the city budget every, little bit counts," Wood said.

Wood is less certain how orders to stay at home will affect the city's gas tax revenues, which is .36 cents per gallon.

For the time being, the city isn't considering layoffs. Most employees cover multiple aspects of keeping the city running. For example, Wood answered the city's reception phone the day he was interviewed by the Keizertimes while others were working on different projects.

"We run pretty lean already so when you start looking at what isn't essential or what might be cut, the conversation doesn't last very long," he said.

To help Keizer residents, the city is waiving all late fees on utility bills for the time being and customers will not have water shut off until the pandemic subsides.

"We're planning for three or four months. After that, we will work with customers to set up reasonable repayment plans," Wood said.

City officials are also looking for other ways to assist in the global response.

"We presented some numbers at the long range planning meeting and we're going to go back and sharpen our pencils again and see what can we realistically do," Wood said.

There was already a plan to forego a stormwater rate increase, but Wood said the city was now turning looking at skipping a water rate increase. The city's water rates typically climb yearly to pay for capital improvements throughout the system.

"We want to know if we can give everyone a breather," Wood said.

He said those discussions are likely to include a big picture, long-range look at how the police fee will be handled.

the 27 days "would be really difficult to make up."

"We won't be able to pull off instruction for a full 27 days of missed school ... So we're going for supplemental learning," Perry said.

While they have a lot on their plate right now, Perry made it clear that the top priority for the district in this crisis is graduating seniors. It's also at the top of the list for the Oregon Department of Education as what they would like to get guidance on. However, Perry said that they have to start acting now.

"We're not waiting for guidance. We are working on what we believe to be a good plan," Perry said. "We can't wait to

"Right now, our schools are looking at every senior. Are they on track? How many credits are they missing? Could we give them a diploma today? What's going to be the need if nothing changes with graduation requirements?"

The district will likely be required to provide childcare for health care workers and first responders — approximately 2,600 employees at Salem Health have children under the age of 11 according to assistant superintendent Kraig Sproles.

"We're going to have to call staff into work, to meet child care demands, to help with food, to help with supplemental learning," Perry said.

Along with supplemental learning, director of career and technical education, Jim Orth wants the district to also provide online resources for mental health for families and communities that are struggling through this difficult time.

Lillian Govus, director of communications, shared that Salem-Keizer will now pay all regular employees their normal pay without the use of leave or sick time. Govus also informed the board that school officials have been collaborating Marion Polk Food Share, United Way Catholic Community Services and Panera Bread to continue to offer meals at 36 schools.

Despite the school shutdowns, Salem-Keizer's $619.7 million bond construction project hasn't been delayed.

"All our projects are still on schedule," said Michael Wolfe, the chief operation officer. "But things can change over time."

of children assigned to each room. Restaurants can continue to offer delivery and to-go service, and grocery stores, and hospitals, among others, may remain open.

Playgrounds, basketball courts, skate parks and other outdoor recreation facilities are designated as off limits.

Back in Keizer, the Keizer Chamber of Commerce is preparing for Oregon businesses to become eligible for Small Business Association Impact Loans.
