"I want to thank each and every one of you for making yourselves uncomfortable to make me feel safe because that is what you are doing," Snyder said.

While many struck an appreciative tone, there were difficult moments dragging some of Keizer's past into the light.

When she was 16 years old, Snyder said, a Keizer police officer drew a gun on her which prompted her to move out of Keizer for a period of time so that she could feel safe.

Written testimony also recalled a time when the Keizer Police Department did not have the more forward-thinking leadership it has presently. Former co-city manager John Morgan wrote to the council to remind them of times before many of the current councilors lived in Keizer.

"In the 1990s, a rallying cry in the police department (was): 'Let's go beat some b**ners!' Both leadership and toleration of this type of white supremacist ethic was part of the justification for firing then police chief, Chuck Stull," he said.

While Keizer voters approved a measure to rewrite the city charter and remove the language that marginalized LGBTQ+ residents, another local leader told councilors that it was incumbent upon them to continue leading the city away from such incidents.

"That history doesn't define you as council members, if you walk away from it. The closer you stay to that history, the more it will stain you," Levi Herrera-Lopez wrote in a submitted statement to the council. Herrera-Lopez is the executive director of Mano a Mano Family Center, a Salem-based nonprofit that serves more than 100 Keizer families.

Michele Roland-Schwartz, a Keizer resident and director of a local nonprofit that works with other agencies to train in and reduce risk factors for domestic violence, talked about the preventative work that the Oregon Attorney General's Task Force has tried to do when it comes to working with the most vulnerable populations. She spoke specifically with Native and Indigenous populations where it is not a matter of "if" they experience domestic violence, but "when".

She said sexual violence is deeply connected to attitudes of manifest destiny, white supremacy and stolen land.

"This city taking bold leadership and denouncing white supremacy helps crack that open and it offers us an opportunity to heal communities," Roland-Schwartz said.

While many of the changes councilors made to the document were met with approval by those offering public testimony, others still saw room for growth.

"Unfortunately, what I see in the draft statement looks like the worst of both worlds," said Keizer resident Pat Fisher in her written statement to the council. "It does not have sufficient detail to discern what actions really need to be taken – and by whom – nor does it have a reassuring or welcoming tone."

Fisher also offered in-person testimony before the council where she advised them to rephrase much of the document as though it were talking to a neighbor. She also wanted to see the council move rapidly toward formal adoption.

"I hope that you will get this done before the turn over of the new council because you all have invested a lot in this and it would be that much more difficult if you had to start over with different people involved," Fisher said.

The council is not allowed to vote during work sessions, but some version of the values statement will likely be taken up at a city council meeting in the coming months.

HIGHER: 'We have to come together'

He also tried to clear up some perceived confusion over the Black Lives Matter movement.

"Black Lives Matter is a literal organization, but it's also a rallying cry to say, 'Listen, Black lives matter because we've seen Black lives taken at the drop of a hat by police, and that doesn't happen to other races,'" he said.

While Black Lives Matter existed long before 2020, the effort gained a new urgency when George Floyd was killed under the knee of a police officer in Minneapolis, Minn. His crime was allegedly trying to pass a counterfeit $20 bill.

Mayor Cathy Clark asked how the council might address the belief system of white supremacists without overstepping rights to free speech. Councilor Elizabeth Smith had researched the issue and only found two other Oregon cities calling out white supremacy.

"You don't have to be timid if you want to be progressive," replied Williams. "We don't always have to be followers because that is the opposite of leading."

"Those that don't want to accept it and live by it, won't. If we are going to grow together, live together and prosper we have to come together. What's wrong with putting in place how we get there? If we make it known, and stand behind it, that is the start."

New agent at Keizer reality office

Alexandria Sanchez has joined the Keizer Bledsoe Santana Team Realty office.

"Whether it's selling a home that has lasting memories or buying a dream home that is filled with endless opportunities to create new memories. My years of customer service has taught me to listen to my client's wants and needs and find the perfect fit for their taste, said Sanchez.

Freddy Ruiz Jr. is the office's broker. Sanchez was born in the Willamette Valley and attended the University of Oregon after graduating from Sprague High School. She is married to Rocky Sanchez and is step-mother to Kyha.

Bledsoe Santana Realty Team is located at 4131 River Road N.

city councilor is to listen to the people of the community and do my best to apply what I hear in the decisions that are made. I want Keizer to maintain the small town, close community feel that I have loved since starting kindergarten here. I want our city to be a place that my kids and grandkids will want to call home," Juran wrote.

Juran will join fellow candidate Ross Day as the two new faces on the city council in January.
