

to put us in the lead.”

The Senators, however, put together a substantial threat in the top of the seventh, starting the frame with a walk and a base hit.

Instead of sticking with his bullpen, Torcato elected to put in Logan Dubbe, the Volcanoes top pitcher, who was already scheduled to throw two days later, to come into the game with two on and no one out.

The move worked out brilliantly for the Volcanoes.

After Malcolm Dowell laid down a sacrifice bunt to advance the runners, JaVon Logan was intentionally walked to load the bases. But in the face of adversity, Dubbe struck out the next two batters to end the contest and give the Volcanoes the victory.

“He is a bulldog and he wanted to do it. Logan got ready quickly and he shut them out,” Torcato said.
