Icelandic tradition celebrates books

Want to start a new holiday tradition?
 Why not relax and adopt one from Iceland that dates back to the 1940s. Once World War II ended, many European nations isolated themselves while they rebuilt their economies. Iceland had remained neutral during the war so they had a more robust economy, but fewer items available to spend it on. Paper was one of the few things readily available so books became cherished presents and Jolabokaflod (Book Flood) was born.
 In September free catalogs are sent to all households and the Icelanders hit the bookstores. Books are lovingly selected and wrapped for family and friends. In fact, books are the most popular present in Iceland. On Christmas Eve the books are unwrapped and the evening is spent reading and drinking cocoa. Doesn't this sound like a bookworm's dream?
