

JEFFERSON: 'It's a great place to be a police officer.'

you were doing CPR on a little child that didn't make it. Those kinds of things traumatize everyone, but we're expected to do those kinds of things.

"I still know those two babies' names. I still know the sound that the mom made when they found out their child didn't make it. They carry with you, they don't just go away, which is why you have to go get help."

As a strong advocate for self-care, Jefferson was thrilled when KPD introduced their "Healthy Badge" program, contracting with Harden Psychological Associates to provide mental health check-ins with sworn officers and civilian support staff.

The program has every officer going to see a clinical and police psychologist at least once per year.

"When I shared with people in the law enforcement community what we were doing, they were like 'that is so cool.' I wish they would have had this when I started," Jefferson said. "It's important to get a mental check-up, especially in this line of work. We have to take care of our people."

This is just one of the ways that KPD looks out for their own according to Jefferson.

As a father of three, Jefferson appreciated that family atmosphere that was always prevalent at KPD. Despite his hectic job, he always felt supported by KPD while coaching his kids in different youth sports and being there for his family when they needed him.

"Keizer always had that hometown feeling, not just as a city, but also within the police department. It is very much a family entity within itself. Everyone knows each other, spouses and kids," Jefferson said. "Whether it's with sports, or letting a guy have the night off to watch his daughter sing in the Christmas concert, they always bend over backwards to ensure that our families came first. It's a great place to be a police officer. You cannot get better."

For the next three months, Jefferson will be staying in a small municipality in Sweden, called Tjörn, which is where his wife is originally from.

"It's like the Oregon Coast on steroids. It's a great place to relax," Jefferson said.

Jefferson currently doesn't have any long-term retirement plans, but he knows that for the foreseeable future, he is looking forward to getting more rest and continuing to invest in his mental health.

"I have been sorting through stuff. I recognize what I have been through and that there are traumas in there that are still there. Right now, I am doing short term goals and that means taking care of myself," Jefferson said.

What Keizer PD does really well is protecting citizens from knowing some of the things that go on in this sleepy town. That's our job, to protect people ...
