

KALAPUYA: 'All of Oregon was tribal ...'

a presentation she put together at the council's request. A volunteer historian at Chemawa Indian School for 12 years, her work has been featured in The Oregonian, on OPB and academic journals.

Reddick explained how the local papers at the time of the school's establishment said the land was donated by Salem residents, but the truth is that the students paid for it.

She said much of the ancient Chemawa land, and the school's original land allocation, now lies beneath the interstate highway.

"The remaining 300 acres is still an enclave owned and controlled by the federal government," she said. "Thus in 1885, an Indian school was established on ancient Chemawa land just east of what, 98 years later, would become the City of Keizer."

Reddick's moving presentation centered on the Chemawa school's history – both the good and the bad – and how Chemawa school land was ultimately deeded directly to the students whose work funded the construction of the original facility.
