melon seeds to plant) the spring. This we enjoyed very much; it brought to our minds the extended grain fields that waved about our cottage in Illinois—of the beautiful spring when winter's ice and chill had departed before the breath of warmer season—of the May-mornings, when we had gone forth to the plow-fields and followed barefooted in the new-turned furrow—and of the many long days of grain-growing and ripening, in which we had watched the daily change in the fields of wheat and oats.

These hours of plying our fingers (not sewing) in the ground flew quickly by, but not without their tears and forebodings that ere we could gather the results, famine might lay our bodies in the dust.

Indeed, we could see no means by which we could possibly sustain ourselves to harvest again. Winter—a season of sterility and frosty nights—was fast approaching, and to add to my desolateness I plainly saw that grief, or want of food, or both, were slowly, and inch by inch, enfeebling and wasting away Mary Ann.

The Indians said that about sixteen miles away there was a "Taneta" (tree) that bore a berry called "Oth-to-to," upon which they had subsisted for some time, several years before, but it could be reached only by a mountainous and wretched way of sixty miles. Soon a large party made preparations and set out in quest of this "life preserver." Many of those accustomed to bear burdens were not able to go. Mary Ann started, soon gave out and returned. A few Indians accompanied us, but it was a disgrace for them to bear burdens; this was befitting only to squaws and captives. I was commanded to pick up my basket and go with them, and it was only with much pleading I could get them to spare my sister the undertaking when she gave out. I had borne that "Chiechuck" empty and full over many hundred miles, but never over so rugged a way, nor when seemed so heavy as now.

"We reached the place on the third day and found the taneta to be a bush, and very much resembling the mosquito, only with a much larger leaf. It grew to a height of from five to thirty feet. The berry was much more pleasant to the taste than the mosquito; the juice of it when extracted and mixed with water was very much like the orange. The tediousness and perils of this trip were very much enlivened with the hope of getting something with which to nourish and prolong the life of Mary. She was very much depressed and appeared quite ill when I left her.

"After wandering about for two days with but little gathered, six of us started in quest of some place where the oth-to-to might be more abundant. We traveled over twenty miles away from our temporary camp. We found tanetas in abundance and loaded with the berry. We had reached a field of them we judged never found before.

"Our baskets being filled, we hasten to join the camp party before they should start for the village. We soon lost our way, the night being dark, and wandered without water the whole night, and were nearly all sick from eating our oth-to-to berry. Towards daybreak exhausted and three of our number very sick, we were compelled to halt. We watched over and nursed the sick, swearing them with the medical leaf always kept with us, and about the only medicine used by the Mohaves. But our efforts were vain, for before noon the three had breathed their last. A fire was kindled and their bodies were burned.
