Our Honolulu Letter.

Honolulu, P. I. Sept. 28, 1903. Editor of the County Journal:

I feel in self this mornning in a somewhat nervous mood of the Orient hotel in Manila. After my long voyage across the Pacific complete rest is indeed very appreciable.

When I reached San Francisco I found all the transports crowded. It was utterly impossible for me to get a cabin in either of the two that were sailing, so I purchased a ticket and boarded the American Marine, one of the floating palaces of the Pacific.

August 25 we sailed out of Golden Gate harbor onto the broad expanse of the Pacific. Life on board a vessel is very much the same day after day, but with many changes, such as music and lively companions, such as we had, the time passed swiftly. Six days out from San Francisco land was sighted, and the captain informed us that it was Molokai, the leper island of the Hawaiian group.

At half past five in the evening we steamed into the harbor of Honolulu. We drove over the city by moonlight and it seemed as if I had emerged into a fairy land so beautiful are the sights and scenery. After leaving the island it was ten days before we made another stop. We steamed out of our course in order to reach the Midway Islands where the Pacific Cable company has a station. We cruised near the island and after signalling those on board the captain threw a huge tin overboard filled with books and edibles he had collected. There are 12 persons living on this oasis of the sea.

After leaving Honolulu our next stop was at Yokohama. We were in this harbor two days. The first thing noticeable on entering this Oriental city is the unsanitary condition existing. I find this condition prevalent in all the towns and cities in the East. The Japanese of the lower class pay practically no heed to dress, being at best very scantily clothed. At Nagasaki I saw the largest schools in Japan, and more children than I ever expect to see again. Some wore clothes, and others not—merely a matter of taste.

After leaving Nagasaki our course took across the Yellow sea to the mouth of the Yangtze Klang river near Shanghai. The waters of the river are thick with mud being almost brown, but where they mingle with the sea it is a beautiful yellow. At sunset and sunrise this expanse is a sheet of gold.

We arrived in Hong Kong September 23 where we changed vessels and sailed the following day. Hong Kong is an imposing city, more like the cities in the States, and the rugged scenery reminds one of the low hills of Oregon, especially along the Columbia. I have a feeling of nausea come over me when I think of our trip across the China Sea. After crossing the Pacific and the several seas on our way every one felt sure of themselves, but we had reckoned without our host. Even the steward who had been rated on the water succumbed to the ailment which made a sorry looking lot of us.

We reached Manila Sept. 26, just one month out from San Francisco. The city is a far nicer one than I expected to see. Beautiful drives and large, imposing buildings. The climate is delightful. The native horse here is much smaller even than our Indian ponies in Oregon, but swift and sturdy little animals. The Caribou, or water buffalo, is plentiful in the city and to me it is a novel sight to see a little Filipino driving or riding one of these large, ungainly creatures. But they seem very tame and easily managed. I liked their gait to that of a snail.

Mrs. Lettie Miller.
