A Good Candidate

H. A. Brattain of Paisley, Or., announces himself as a candidate for joint representative of the twenty-first district, comprising Crook, Lake, Grant and Klamath. The Lakeview Examiner speaks of the gentleman as follows:

"Now that H. A. Brattain has consented to be a candidate for the nomination on the republican ticket for representative to the legislature from the twenty-first representative district, comprising Grant, Crook, Klamath and Lake counties, it behooves every republican to put himself to work to secure the nomination of Mr. Brattain. If elected, which there is no possible doubt, he will not only represent Lake county, but will co-operate with his colleague from any other part of the district whomsoever he may be for the welfare of the district. There is needed legislation which will work to the mutual benefit of every resident of the district, and in which Mr. Brattain is willing, and anxious to assist in bringing about. There too, is special legislation much needed in Lake county which his wide knowledge of existing conditions especially qualifies him to advocate and put through the legislature. Mr. Brattain has broad views on all matters of general public interest; he is a man of high educational qualifications, being a graduate from the State University of Oregon, is experienced in business affairs, successful in all he has ever undertaken and popular throughout the district where he is known."

GOVERNMENT STUDIES WATER

The old-fashioned idea that, for practical men, water was water if it would flow through a pipe in sufficient quantity has recently been greatly modified, as those practical men have come to realize that a part of the production-cost in many industries must be charged to the use of water unsuited to their purposes.

The most important factor affecting the value of water for domestic supplies is its potability, which is determined primarily by its freedom from dangerous, ill-smelling, and bad-tasting organisms or substances; but for industrial uses these features are as a rule rather secondary in importance, and the suitability of the supply is determined by the amount and kinds of mineral matter dissolved or suspended in it. Especially is this true of water used for steam making, in paper making, in bleaching, and for other similar purposes. In some industries, however, such as starch making, brewing, distilling, and ice manufacturing, the hygienic quality of the water must be considered as its physical and chemical characteristics.

All natural waters contain more or less foreign matter. Leaves, sawdust, sticks, sand, clay, and other material may be found suspended in it, and chemical analysis may reveal resins, gums, and tannins extracted from vegetable matter, and any one or all of a dozen or more minerals. A study of the peculiar composition of different waters and of their adaptability to various industrial processes is therefore of great importance to many people.

Such a study has for some time formed a part of the work of the water-resources branch of the United States geological survey.

Established with the broad purpose of determining the economic value of the water resources of the country, this branch of the survey has carried on investigations of many kinds. The flow of streams has been measured at more than 1500 places in the United States and Alaska; underground water conditions have been investigated in many States; and the quality of both surface and underground waters in its relation to domestic supply and to manufacturing and other industries, has been systematically studied. Since 1896 the survey has published 216 reports resulting from this work, the subjects including surface water supply, underground waters and the geologic conditions affecting them, water power, quality of water, irrigation, and general hydrographic investigations. A list of these papers will be sent on application to the Director of the Survey at Washington, D. C.

The results of the study of the quality of the surface waters of the country are now being prepared for publication. In making this study about 190 stations were established on streams in various parts of the country, at which samples of water were collected daily for a period of one year. The daily samples were united in sets of ten, and the composite was then subjected to complete mineral analysis. The analytical work on this large investigation has been nearly completed. As was to be expected, it shows that the waters from different parts of the country vary greatly in chemical composition and consequently in their availability for industrial uses. It is hoped that this report will be ready for the printer early in the spring and that it will be published during the summer.
