rey act, and was inaugurated by Three Sisters Company 1893. This company passed into the hands of the Col umbia Southern Irrigating Company, which is owned by a number of prominent capitalists of Portland. The company and the land have been in litigation for several years, as the Columbia Southern failed to keep its contracts with the farmers who took land on the project. The trouble came when the company found it could not put enough water on the land, and there was also a lack of transportation facilities. With the two railroads building up the Deschutes the surveys show that one line will be within three and the other six miles of the project. The project is watered by the Tumalo Creek, which empties into the Deschutes.

A reservoir to contain 90,000 acre feet of water is projected. There will be a dam 70 feet high, forming a lake covering 1500 acres. Into this reservoir the flood waters will go, and this water can be used later to supplement the natural flow of the creek. By means of the reservoir the project is expected to solve the problem and make the land highly valuable. This con servation of water can bring from 12,000 to 18,000 more acres within the scope of the water, bringing the total screage up to 45,000.

Provisions have been made for the settlers now on the project. The firmers can either make a new contract, paying an increase, or they can cancel their old contracts and receive their money back.

Ten years are allowed for paying for the lands. A first payment is wanted, and the second year no payment need be made, the company desiring to give the farmers time in which to get something from the lands. Six per cent interest is charged on deferred payments, but those who want to pay the full price at once and save the interest are at liberty to do so.

When 8 per cent of the lands are sold, the company, under its contract, must organize a water-users' association, and one share of stock Furs and Hides Wanted must be issued to each acre to the
