Oregon Trunk Line Construction

side slopes to towering, rounded hills. On the cliff side, railroad construction is costly and difficult; on the other side it is comparatively easy. The cliffs alternate from one shore to the other, and almost always where the Hill line is finding easy work, the Harriman road is blasting a road through solid rock, and vice versa. To avoid one of the frowning cliffs where rock tunnel work would be necessary the Oregon Trunk line jumps the river 73 miles from the mouth, and again there is a conflict with the Harriman survey. This conflict exists for 12 miles and to a point near the mouth of Trout Creek, where the Deschutes line leaves the Deschutes to follow other canyons to the plains. The Oregon Trunk line continues on up the Deschutes 12 miles farther, and then turns up Willow Creek.

For ten miles up Willow Creek the Oregon Trunk line will be working in solid rock. In that 10 miles there will be six tunnels, and the cost of construction will approximate $150,000 a mile. Camps for construction work in Willow Creek Canyon were established by the Oregon Trunk line about one month ago at Madras.

The next camp south established by the Oregon Trunk line is at the crossing of Crooked River, 20 miles beyond Madras. There grading is under way on each side of the river and approaches are being blasted in the rock for what will be one of the most remarkable bridges in the United States.

Crooked River cuts a meandering gash through what is in that vicinity a level plain covered by juniper trees. One hundred yards from the canyon the stranger traveling through the country might look across it and not know that the canyon existed. Across this chasm the distance at the bridge site is about 320 feet. From either side one can drop a stone straight down into Crooked River 32 feet below. One steel span will leap this chasm. When the traveler journeying to Central Oregon over the Oregon Trunk line leaves the Columbia river and enters the mouth of the Deschutes he will be in bare and unproductive canyons while the train speeds over 100 miles of track. He will gain no inkling of the extent of the rolling fields of grain that lie on the plains of Sherman and Wasco counties 2000 feet above him. The train will emerge from Willow Creek Canyon with startling suddenness through a gap in a wall of rimrock that forms the western edge of the saucer-like basin in which Madras is situated. The train will come from a wild and rocky canyon as if from a tunnel, onto the cultivated fields of Central Oregon. From there southward the Oregon Trunk line travels through grain fields, irrigated lands or timber, all of which will contribute to its tonnage.

SPECIAL ANNOUNCEMENT

It has been brought to our attention that it is the opinion of some that we are endorsing "wildcat" schemes owing to the fact that we had placed on our map which we have printed on our literature, the names of places not in existence except in the imaginations of the promoters. We did this to save answering inquiries as to the location of said places. We may say, however, that we do not recommend or endorse any scheme which by misleading or exaggerated advertising seeks to obtain the money of investors quickly by misrepresenting the facts, but recommend nothing to prospective buyers except such propositions as we know to be absolutely reliable. We have not sold, nor do we wish to sell any lots or property in any place or townsite that cannot bear the closest investigation, and up to the present no townsite has been projected which, on present showing, we could thoroughly, recommend to our patrons.
