Railroad Men See Opportunities

On their recent trip through Central Oregon officials of the Northern Pacific Railway learned for the first time what advantages and what opportunities that vast, undeveloped interior empire contains.

They marveled at the rugged beauties of Deschutes Canyon, at the remarkable feats of engineering necessary to build the railroad through it to the productive tablelands above, then at the wonderful stretch of agricultural territory which was the objective point of the rail construction.

Now that the railroad has been built more than 100 miles south from the Columbia river, with assurance that it will reach Bend early next fall, the greatest apparent need that impressed itself upon the Northern Pacific men and the Portland newspaper representatives accompanying them, is people. Practical farmers of sound sense and plenty of experience are wanted, and the Northern Pacific, which through its half-interest in the Oregon Trunk Railway, is eager to develop the county, will aid in bringing them to Oregon and locating on farms in the interior.

Filling a Pullman exhibit car with Central Oregon products and sending it out on a tour of the east in the same manner that other sections of the northwest have been exploited is now being considered probable as one of the means to be adopted to win immigration for the territory tributary to the Oregon Trunk.

Great care will be exercised in stocking this car, as it is desired to obtain only such products as represent the average yield. Efforts will be made to avoid freak specimens or present figures of abnormal production. In this way the possibilities of the interior can be presented in the fairest and most accurate manner, and immigrants coming to the state in consequence of seeing the car cannot be disappointed.

Close attention will be given to routing the travelling exhibit. Past experience has demonstrated that it is not possible to bring a farmer from a mountain section into a prairie country and expect him to be successful. The reverse rule also is true, and in the future efforts will be made to avoid having farmers from level states settle on hilly ground.

As Central Oregon is primarily a stock and grain country, the greatest activity will be directed toward bringing men experienced in those lines into the state.

Definite action toward stocking an exhibit car exclusively with Central Oregon products has not yet been taken. If it is not decided to devote an entire car to the interior, each of the several cars that the Northern Pacific has on the road every year will be required to give more space and attention to that region.

J. G. Woodworth, of St. Paul, traffic manager of the Northern Pacific, was enthusiastic in his estimate of the future possibilities of the territory the excursionists traversed. He realizes that the country is not superior to many other well developed districts in Oregon and Washington that have become famed as fruit, stock, grain and vegetable centers, but he believes that it is capable of matching the record of any of these and because of its size would receive a proportionate amount of attention.

"What Central Oregon needs more than anything else is people," said A. D. Charlton, assistant general passenger agent.

He will join with other officials of the Northern Pacific in an organized and persistent campaign to induce people to enter.—Oregonian.
