

Making Good Time on Steel Bridge

Rapid headway is being made on the massive steel bridge across the Crooked river, on the line of the Oregon Trunk, and if the company has good luck in the delivery of materials, the new road into the interior will be completed and under operation to Bend before the end of August. Bend is to be the southern terminus of the line, although surveys have been run southward to a connection with the Pacific & Eastern, now in operation from Medford to Butte Falls.

The new Crooked River Bridge will be the seventh highest structure of its kind in the world, and one of the finest and most expensive type of cantilever construction in railroad building in America. The one lofty span which bridges the picturesque gorge of the Crooked river at a point about five miles south of Opal City, to which trains are now running, is to be 340 feet in length from rimrock to rimrock on either brink of the chasm through which flows the roaring stream at a depth of 360 feet below the top of the canyon.

The massive steel trusses are being projected outward from either side, and are anchored in solid rock to a depth of about 50 feet below the bridge level.

The slow progress heretofore on this feature of the work has been due to the slow delivery of steel from the East. The line was graded to the bridge approach from the north and also from the south approach on to Bend, so that as soon as the bridge has been completed it will be but a matter of a few days to string and fasten the rails for the balance of the uncompleted section of the road.

While the bridge is being built exclusively by the Oregon Trunk, it will be used jointly by that line and the Deschutes Railroad, the Harriman line into the interior now building to Redmond.—Telegram.
