

WILL PATROL SEA IN SEARCH OF ICE

United States Revenue Cutter to Locate Danger Spots.

WAR ON BERGS IN SPRING.

Maritime Nations Join in Bearing the Expense of Movement Looking to Protection of Thousands of Lives and Millions of Property From Arctic Menace of the Atlantic Ocean.

Active military operations are about to begin in the war declared by the nations of the world represented at the London conference for safety at sea against the frozen elements, whose icebergs, like the viking freebooters of other days, make annual descent from their northern fastnesses into southern waters to be a terror inspiring peril of the Atlantic ocean.

The revenue cutter Seneca, the first ship in the world in international service, has been ordered on scout duty.

Not yet are the invading icebergs expected to leave their northern clime, but the Seneca is directed to go right into the midst of their Arctic camp to observe their preparations for the spring movement southward.

A Hazardous Mission.

The scout duty is attended with danger. The Seneca will be required to risk the crushing force of the enemy, relying upon swiftness and craft to escape and report observations.

When the scouting assignment is brought to an end with the start of the invaders toward the south, then the campaign against the icebergs will enter another phase. Patrol duty will begin and the Seneca will have the aid of a sister ship. The enemy's movements will be under constant surveillance and their force and progress subject to intermittent report to the nations warring upon them.

It was a big compliment paid to the revenue cutter service of the United States, says the Washington Star, when the nations in conference awarded to it the duty of fighting the icebergs. It came about because the icebergs patrol had been conducted by the revenue cutter service with splendid results in providing safety for ships at sea.

Based upon an estimate of the comparative value of national shipping interests, a division of the expense of maintaining an icebergs campaign was established. England agreed at once on its own initiative to bear 30 per cent of the expense. Germany considered herself obligated to pay only 15 per cent. France was determined to pay no less than Germany. The United States' share of the expense was estimated at the same proportion. Other nations agreed to bear the rest of the cost, ranging from 5 per cent up.

The advance guard of the icebergs invaders is not expected to march until the first days of May. In the meantime the Seneca will conduct observations and prepare the maritime world for the exact moment of the descent of the icebergs from the north.

Besides being the only ship afloat on ever afloat in international world service, the Seneca is the only derelict destroyer in the world. She is almost the largest boat in the revenue cutter service, is well designed and fully equipped for derelict destroying and the special task now assigned to her and has engines to drive her that any seagoing vessel would be proud of.

Scientific Observations.

Methods of observation for obtaining results which it is hoped will aid in defeating the menace of floating ice are set down in the orders. Observations are to be taken at recorded times, extending from the surface to the bottom of the sea. These observations are to be made at well defined geographical positions throughout the region patrolled.

While the practical work of the Seneca as outlined in the orders is not to be subordinated to the work of scientific investigation, the derelict destroyers are to take aboard at Halifax a detail of scientists, with their instruments.

Captain Johnston is required to afford these scientists every facility for aid and assistance in making their observations. He will collect what data they may desire. It is believed that most valuable information can be collected from the observations of the scientist without in any way interfering with the primary duties of the Seneca.

SIMPLE COOKING LONDON FAC

Display of Robust Appetites is Fashion's Latest Decree.

What may be termed nursery cookery is all the rage in society circles. For the moment dainty food and French dishes are at a discount among smart people in England.

One country house hostess recently had porridge served to her ball guests before they left in the morning. Suet puddings, for the past twenty years never seen on the boards of smart London donors, now come to the table almost every day. Doctors have taken to ordering them for the children, and the adults have awakened to the fact that they are very good. Dripping toast and sausages are on all the best breakfast tables, and instead of talking of their dyspepsia cures and appendicitis, as they did in Edwardian times, people now feel the correct thing to be to profess and display robust appetites.

RIGHT AND DUTY.

Right is the faith of the individual. Duty is the common collective faith. Right can but organize resistance. It may destroy; it cannot found. Duty builds up, associates and unites. It is derived from a general law, whereas right is derived only from human will. There is nothing, therefore, to forbid a struggle against right. Any individual may rebel against any right in another individual which is injurious to him, and the sole judge left between the adversaries is force, and such, in fact, has frequently been the answer which societies based upon right have given to their opponents.

Societies based upon duty would not be compelled to have recourse to force. Duty, once admitted as the rule, excludes the possibility of struggle, and by rendering the individual subject to the general aim it cuts at the very root of those evils which right is unable to prevent and only affects to cure. Moreover, progress is not a necessary result of the doctrine of right. It merely admits it as a fact—Joseph Mazzini.

Horrors, No!

"I wish that chickens were built like centipedes," snarled the old grouch, gnawing a drumstick. "Don't you?"

"Great Scott, no!" cried the young man, blushing. "I'm to marry one tomorrow."—Judge.

A Curious Dance.

He stepped on her train, and he caused her much pain. He was plowing around at a dance. She wanted to fuss, but she didn't dare fuss. So she gave him a curiously glance.—Cincinnati Enquirer.

Domestic Trials.

Mrs. Bocker—Very. If I give him a poor dinner he wants a divorce, and if I give him a good dinner he calls it lobbying.—Philadelphia Ledger.

Jacks.
