TREES AND FARM SUCCESS.

Exponent of New Agriculture Believe

Another Eden Possible. Restore the garden of Eden. Adam and Eve lived easily in the garden because it was full of harvest yielding trees, and the curse that fell upon man was the fact that he had to grow small stuff like grain and vegetables, the herbs of the field, by which means he ate bread in the sweat of his brow. The man who thinks this possible is Dr. J. Russell Smith, professor of industry in the Whafton school of finance and commerce, University of Pennsylvania, who told 500 of the leading pomologists of the country that the cost of living rests in the 'r hands. He gave the American Pomological sociesome of the results of an 18,000 mile journey he has recently complet ed for the university, studying the pos aibility of a new agriculture.

Trees are the great engines of food production," he said, "and we should at once begin their extensive utiliza-tion. Europe and Africa are showing us the way. Portugal has orchards of acorn bearing oak trees that are far more valuable than farms within forty miles of Philadelphia. The great trou ble with the American pomologists is that they are too aristocratic. They have been too proud to think about feeding a pig, yet the pig feed problem is one of the big problems of America. for the pigs eat more than we do.

"There is evidence in both Europe and America to indicate that properly be made as productive of pig food as is corn and do it much more easily and for a great deal longer time. The suckers that arise from the stumps of two varieties of Pennsylvania oaks have produced good crops at the ages of three and seven years respectively. I have seen acorn orchards bearing well in Spain on rocky slopes so steep that the farmers only permitted the little pigs to go in, because the big ones might fall and break their necks.

"The tree offers the best means of arid lands and in some cases the best dozens of new crops which can easily double our productive area. At present harvest yielding trees cover but the many varieties of oak for forage."
