Forage Poisoning Caused Death of McCall Horses

W. H. Lytle, state veterinarian, was hastily summoned to Prineville last Saturday to inquire into the cause of death of a number of horses belonging to Henry McCall. While driving his exhibit of livestock to the fair Mr. McCall lost one of the horses attached to one of the cattle wagons. Then two others died and several were very sick. The public health officer was appealed to and Dr. Rosenberg telephoned Mr. Lytle. That gentleman came at once and after a thorough examination he pronounced the cause of trouble as "forage poisoning" or so-called "cerebro spinal meningitis."

The state veterinarian says: "This disease is one that is associated with improperly cured forage or forage that has been contaminated with molds. The formation of many of these deadly fungi are not well understood. They seem to originate under certain conditions of climate, temperature and moisture that varies from year to year. One pasture or field will frequently show contamination while an adjoining field will be free although conditions will seem identical."

"The symptoms of forage poisoning tending, as it does, to involve the nervous system and particularly the brain and spinal cord, has caused this disorder to be called a meningitis, while properly speaking it does not often take on the nature of an inflammation of these organs."

"By some little understood process contaminated forage when once taken into the system sets up an excessive growth and involvement of the entire animal economy, through either by means of poisons produced by reason of their growth on the injeata, which upon absorption tends to paralyze the brain and spinal cord or a direct entrance into the blood stream, they bring about a pronounced weakness and locomotory disturbance to the animal that has been infested with them. Animals that have once become infected and have been heavily charged with the poisonous products of the mold-contaminated food seldom recover, especially is this true if they have become so weakened as to be forced to lie down or have become paralyzed.

"Forage that is contaminated cannot well be told from that which is not, except by means of feeding. However, well cured alfalfa has never been associated with this malady and has been extensively used as a ration on which to place animals that have become infected by eating other forage. Generally speaking, hays that have several species of grains in variable stages of ripeness are the most dangerous as it is generally possible to cut such when all are in the proper development for well cured forage. This often leaves the unripe grains free to undergo mold contamination if other conditions are right. Fortunately it is seldom the case that all these necessary conditions are present and this is why we seldom encounter this trouble."

"Contaminated forage *is not harmful to cattle and other animals excepting sheep, and itself tends to become free from the harmful products after a couple of months time so that it will not be injurious to horses. Cured timothy or clover hays as a rule are not injurious, hence the main trouble may be looked for in grain hays that have been cut in different stages of ripeness."

"Treatment resolves itself into freeing the system of the contaminating food and a general systematic disinfection. This can best be done by the services of a trained sanitarian and all such conditions should be immediately called to the attention of your local veterinarian. This malady, while not of an infectious order is such that expert knowledge of the source of the trouble may be of great benefit in combating the ailment."
