Best Wheat Growing Methods for Crook Co

Of course two of the most important points for successful wheat growing are the preparation of the seed bed for the crop and the use of pure well-cleaned seed of best varieties for seeding. If the summerfallow were well prepared and the land well cultivated and kept free from weeds throughout the fallow season, the seed bed is now in good condition for planting the seed. Experiments in this section have proven almost beyond a question that the Turkey Red wheat is the best winter variety for us to grow, and in the majority of cases winter wheat will prove better on our dry lands than will the spring varieties. Almost always wheat will tend to "run out" on land where the rainfall is as light as it is in Crook county so that we must either select our seed by hand in the field or purchase seed from the outside every few years.

We cannot be satisfied with simply buying the seed from the outside, however, nor by simply saving the seed from a particularly good field of grain, but should use the fanning mill strenuously on the wheat which we are to use for seed. The heads in the field are developed from a crossing of the stalks in the field while they are in bloom. Thus even a small number of poor seeds may exert a great influence on the yield. The use of the fanning mill will always pay.

Careful experiments have been carried on in Oregon to determine the best time for planting wheat in our dry farming sections and it has been found that it pays to wait until after the fall rains start. Many seasons this will mean that we must wait until as late as the 15th of November but it pays even if delayed this long. If planted before these rains, either shallow or deep, as good results cannot be expected. When planted in the dust shallow a light rain will start the grain, and except other rains follow as needed, the sprouted stalk will dry out and die. If planted deep many of the stalks will not live to reach the surface. If one has a large acreage to plant it may be best to plant a part of the land before the rains and risk its growth in order that, with late rains, there will be less extremely late sowing, but where possible it will pay to sow all after the rains. When sowing after the rains, sow not less than one-half inch and not more than one and one-half inches deep.

It is always advisable in this section to treat the seed with formaldehyde before planting to prevent smut in the field and thirty pounds of good seed per acre is sufficient in this section. A heavier seeding is liable to use up the available moisture before the grain is matured.

A Beautiful Publication

"The Scenic Columbia River Route to the Great Pacific Northwest" is the somewhat lengthy title of an excellent tourist folder just issued by the Union Pacific system. The show places of the Great Northwest are done in natural tints, making a most attractive medium in which to spread the gospel of this country. This beautiful publication will be distributed all over America and will have great influence in diverting a large share of the expected volume of travel to the expositions in California next year to Oregon.

Madras Farmer Believes in Chickens

P. D. Johnson, who lives eight miles north of Madras, is in Prineville this week. Mr. Johnson came to this country two years ago from Nebraska. He says that while his two crops of grain have been short, he has managed to keep more than even. He is developing a new place. His chickens and cows, he says, pay expenses. He believes chickens pay better than hogs.

Mr. Johnson reports good success with the experimental corn sent out last year to farmers by the O.-W. R. & N. Co. The crop matured nicely and the yield was all that could be wished. The variety sown was known as the Early Dent. He thinks the corn acreage will increase from year to year in his section as farmers better understand its cultivation.
