A short time ago Harry Kimble, postmaster at Meadow, shot and killed a coyote near his house. When the coyote saw him it ran perhaps a hundred yards when it stopped and was shot. This coyote acted rational enough, and what is also strange, was very fat. But Mr. Kimble decided that since the coyote had come so near the house in broad daylight there might be a chance that the animal was rabid. The head was sent to Portland for examination and a few days later Mr. Kimble received a letter saying that the coyote was rabid beyond any possible doubt. Therefore, it appears that a coyote may act very much as usual and apparently in good condition physically, and still be rabid.
