A REMARKABLE REVELATION
 In these days of high cost of living, political parties jockeying for their favorite candidates, big financial interests booming great guns and a great percentage of every publication devoted to news of strife, strikes and the sufferings of humanity, it is refreshing like a cool breeze on an August day, to read something like an editorial that appeared in The Dalles Chronicle of February 19. Because of its lesson, and this "different" atmosphere, we reproduce it in full here:
"Daddy, Me Going Home"
 "Yes Daddy, me going home." With these words William Maynard, two-year-old son of Mr. and Mrs. J. W. Maynard of Thompson's addition, this city, died. It is a pathetic ending to a sweet young life.
 "It teaches, however, immortality of the soul. It is one of the biggest arguments we have ever heard anent the life beyond the grave."
 "Two-year-old William had not been on this earth long enough to have absorbed the learned views about the life hereafter. The little lad logically knew practically nothing of the future existence, immortality and its promises meant little to the boy.
 "He had, so to speak, not yet arrived at the age of understanding.
 "His mother no doubt taught in a general way that when he died he would live again. She taught him, no doubt, that his little soul was of God and therefore indestructible—triumphant over death.
 "But even a precocious child of two years of age could not be expected to digest the solemn import of immortality.
 "Yet, just before the little life was snuffed out, William called his father to him and said with a smile, 'Daddy, me going home.'
 "Home? What home? Why should dying be going home?
 "These things the child knew not of, but the little soul, the immortal spark of the lad remembered past experiences. The soul came from God and remembered God. It perhaps was so pure, so uncontaminated by earthly things that it was yet attuned with heaven. Impressions before birth were strong.
 "And the baby murmured, 'Daddy, me going home.'
 "The baby knew of a certainty that he had come from some celestial sphere and he divined that he was about to return there to an existence where his pure soul would be at home.
 "Oh, you scoffers at immortality. Oh, you fellows who try to refute the promises of everlasting life by stern argument. Consider the certain knowledge of this little child that there was a life beyond the grave, that he was going home to dwell in the house of the Lord forever.
 "This knowledge was not born of experience on this earth. It was not the accumulation of research or accumulated information.
 "The child knew there was a life of spirit because he had recently experienced it. The memory of it had not quite died.
 "Daddy, me going home.' What an argument for immortality of the soul and life beyond the grave. It is irrefutable."
