In these days that are marked by some exploitation and profiteering it is easy to forget the indirect service business renders a moral force. Of course business men make little claim to be altruistic, and the yellow book of credit was instituted primarily as a protective measure rather than a character builder. But its tendency is to keep men true to their word. Through it the conviction grows that most men intend to make their promises good.

Despite all limitations the fact remains that trade has broadened the horizon of men and sent them forth as pioneers into new fields of endeavor. The flag has followed trade in the history of nations. Few forces have been more educative than business.

It often happens that a man's credit rating is the best asset he has. The reputation and goodwill that honest business methods win for a concern is now generally recognized as a pearl of great price too valuable to be thoughtlessly jeopardized.—The Wallowa Sun.

SPIRITS—EVIL AND GOOD

The ancient used to think that a good or evil spirit followed a man all the days of his life. Modern business has its original gent who pursues man every time he asks for credit. According to a recent report every person who solicits credit in a Minneapolis retail store is listed in the book of the Associated Credit Exchange as prompt pay, medium or slow.

The coal or grocery bill left unpaid months ago dogs the footsteps of the buyer like an evil spirit. The bills promptly paid go along with a man like a good attendant spirit to witness to his character.

If money talks in business, character also counts. Business men testify to the fact that not only credit carries more than fifty per cent of modern business, but that it also acts as a constant challenge on integrity and confidence. The West has been built on credit. It is a testimony to the essential reliability of human nature that after fifty years of use, the credit system is stronger today than ever. It has tended to breed confidence in business men rather than distrust.
