How To Prepare A Deer's Head For Mounting

By
Prof. E. N. Mallery

BEND, ORE.

To secure an artistic mount, great care must be taken in taking care of the head.

In the first place, never cut a deer's throat, the bullet that kills him will take care of the bleeding; and if you cut the skin on the front of the throat, you greatly injure the scalp for mounting.

To begin, start at a point between the shoulders and run the knife up the back of the neck to a point between the ears and about two inches from the horns, then make a V-shaped cut to the horns.

Go back to where you started first, (that is between the shoulders) and make a cut to the point of the brislet, (just in front of the fore legs), and back on the other side to where you started.

Take off the scalp in the ordinary manner, being careful not to cut it, and then flesh it by cutting and scraping until every particle of red flesh is removed.

Salt heavily, at least two pounds of salt and one pound of powdered alum to a scalp; roll up the scalp and let it lay in the shade, covered so the flies cannot get to it, for twenty-four hours.

After twenty-four hours spread the scalp in the shade to dry. If the flies are bad, sprinkle the scalp with black pepper.

To prepare the head after the scalp is removed, first run the knife down under the jaws both inside and outside, then taking hold of the upper jaw with one hand and the under jaw with the other, give a smart pull, when the lower jaw will slip out of place and be separated from the head, after which it must be scraped perfectly clean.

Cut off every particle of flesh, taking out the eyes and brain, the latter being removed through the occipital orifice, where the spinal column enters the brain, after which the cavity should be filled with salt. Tie the under jaw to the head and protect the horns from being broken.

I specialize in artistic mounting:

Whole Animals,      Rugs, Robes,
Birds and Fish      Game Heads, and Ladies' and Children's Furs
