

About Disease.

The dictionary says the word means "literally, absence of ease." Everyone who ever rode a bicycle, an automobile or a street car, knows well the difference between a smooth running machine and friction. When there is friction, something is not right. In the body we call it disease, and it is usually accompanied with congestion or inflammation.

An increased blood supply in any part, when natural, is a source of great blessing. It aids digestion after meals, prepares the body for its various normal functions, and supplies the brain with thinking power when in special efforts. It heals our wounds, and, rightly directed, wards off or cures disease. But, like fire, water and electricity—inevitable blessings in their proper spheres, but terrible when let loose—inflammation is often a destructive foe. It is represented in the simple "cold in the head," and in the various forms of catarrh which afflict every organ of the body. A sudden attack we call acute disease, a prolonged continuance, chronic.

Barring accident, the great cause of disease is, we are told by highest authority, "physical sin." One cannot put his finger in the furnace without feeling fire. Nor can one put fiery food in his gastro-enteric apparatus without getting inflammation.

To be sick one must live for it. He must eat bad food, drink bad water, (or other liquid) breathe bad air, think bad thoughts. He must refrain from healthful exercise, from fresh air, sunlight, bathing, restful sleep, and from thoughts that make for human welfare, personal and public.

The road to health is the road of right living, and while there are some "keep off the grass" sign boards along the way, yet it leads through vales resonant with music, through woodland meadows where softest breezes blow, and to a perfectly finished maturity as a result of right habits in early life.

Be then at ease, Life's struggles please When life's pure blood runs clear; And happiness, And healthfulness, Where right thoughts know no fear. —Albert Carey, M. D.
