Why do so many of us "grow old rigidly, or develop an alarming spiritual pomposity in our middle age?" Frank Moore Colby says it is because we "suppress nine-tenths of our thoughts for fear of seeming incorrect." We have too many imaginary obligations-"duties to the crowd, duty to the coterie, duty to the time of day, the constraint of success, the fear of being misunderstood, and the hundred other anxieties to seem something differeut from what we really are some thing far less human and infinitely less absurd." In his book, "Imaginary Obligations," Mr. Colby gives us half a hundred brief, witty talks on these inconsistencies of ours under such headings as: "The people next door," The books we haven't read," "The serious woman," "The pursuit of humor." 'Nothing new," "Reformers and broomsticks," Setting the pace.
