This is what Sherman said about war: "I confess without shame that I am tired and sick of war. Its glory is all moonshine. Even success the most brilliant is over dead and mangled bodies, the anguish and lamentations of distant families appealing to me for missing sons, husbands and fathers. It is only those who have not heard a shout nor heard the shrieks and groans of the wounded and lacerated, that cry aloud for more blood, more vengeance, more desolation. War is hell."

A battle line one hundred miles long, half a dozen-unparalleled conflicts raging at the same time, it may be several days before anything like authentic reports can be obtained. Such was the news early in the week. But those few words make clear one thing, which is that no matter who the immediate victor may be, the loss to all will be irreparable.

To cut off the flower of half a dozen nations in the glory of youth and strength is a loss immeasurable. To break the hearts of the young and beautiful women of half a dozen nations is likewise a loss immeasurable. The first recoil from the acute grief is liable to be the losing of faith in the justice of man and the goodness of God. The next great loss is the absence of children that should have been born to keep the standard of men and women at their best. The French have not yet regained their full stature, because of the unnumbered dead that hallowed the soil of Europe during the twenty years of destruction that marked the career of the first Napoleon, says Goodwin's Weekly.

By careful selection of the seed of corn the crop of Illinois has been increased five bushels per acre in the past few years and much improved in quality. By careful selection some breeds of animals have been brought to what seems almost perfection.

But when armies are to be marshaled the young and brave of a nation are called and then when a devastating war is fought through and the victors are received home with national rejoicing, not many stop to reflect how terrible has been the cost of the triumph.

It was so in ancient Greece until so many of the glorious race were slain that despairing women raised children from slaves. It was so in ancient glorious Rome until the black shadows from Rome's battlefields settled upon the stricken nation and it lay under those shadows for a thousand years.

The loss in money and property caused by a great war can be borne. Out of the gloom of defeat a nation can finally emerge, pick up and restore its shattered industries and go on with its work, but the glorified strength of the young men that went down to death in the war can not be recalled; the shadow on the hearts of young women will remain or be transmitted and cloud the lives of their children.

So, when we try to estimate the cost of any war, except that war be fought for a higher liberty, we can estimate the money cost, the value of the property destroyed, but the greater loss, the deaths of the young and the brave in the fields, the wounds in the hearts of those at home can never be computed, but we can understand enough to enable us to decide that a man or a people that precipitates an unnecessary war commits a sin that only the mercy of God can forgive.
