The body of an unidentified man, aged about 60, was found floating in the Columbia Slough at the foot of Swift boulevard Wednesday afternoon by Patrolman Sloan, who was fishing in that vicinity. Because the body was tied to a string fastened to a pole which had been dug in the bank, it was at first thought that the man might have been a victim of foul play, but it was learned later that other persons had discovered the body before Sloan and had tied it to the bank to keep it from floating away. From papers found in the pockets, it appeared that the man's name was Johnson.
