

Always Being Stung

Alas, I'm always being stung, and always will be to the end and always have since I was young—nor can you consolation lend. For you're an easy mark, as well; meet some gent of polished mien, who has a plated brick to sell, and you dig up the good long green. One half of us are easy marks, who bite at every kind of bait, the other half are soulless sharks, who always keep their nerve on-straight.

Of fall guys there are many sorts, they're like the sands upon the shore; one blows his savings in for quartz he thinks is filled with golden ore. Then golden dreams his slumbers fill, until he finds his quartz is rock; then to the poorhouse on the hill he takes a sad and lonely walk.

One buys an oil well in the north, in regions rich beyond compare; a faker with a wide-spread mouth tells him there is a fortune there. And then he dreams of golden bars, of diamonds, rubies, sapphires, pearls, of costly yachts and motor cars, and happy sessions with the girls. Then comes a sad report some day, that makes his blood fume up and boil: "We struck a bed of sandy clay, but never struck a sign of oil." Oh, he's been stung for all his kale, his gilded stock no comfort yields; and to the poorhouse in the vale he takes the path across the fields.

The poorhouse is a gloomy place, where eyes are dim and hearts are sore; and now and then you see a face, all drawn and haggard, at the door; it is the countenance of one who in his time made quite a fuss; a faker lifted all his mon, and he is waiting there for us. And we shall join him there, anon, and live, like him, on cabbage soup, when all our treasured coin is gone, and we have mortgaged every coop.

The village banker says to me "Bring in your coin and salt it down; our bank's the safest thing," said he, "that ever grew up in this town. Your coin will earn you four per cent, and you won't need to walk the floor; so if you are a prudent gent, you'll bring your bullion and your ore."

I gather up my wealth and start to place it in the banker's care; while jostling through the crowded mart, I meet an oily faker there. He has the blameworthy, finest scheme, to make me rich, yea undoubtly rich, beyond a miser's golden dream; it has no flaw, it has no hitch, we stand and chatter in the sun, and when we leave each other, the faker has my stock of mon, and I've a store of heard-air.

The poorhouse stands upon a slope, where all the winds of winter blow; and some cold day, devoid of hope, I to its gloomy door will go.—Walt Mason in Judge.

Dear Mr. Editor: In this daring venture of yours to send the Review into every home in St. Johns, for six months, free of cost, I wish you great success.

With prices soaring in every thing that goes into newspaper, I cannot see how you can afford to do it. All true friends of St. Johns ought to embrace this opportunity of sending in every bit of news and every good word concerning St. Johns, seeing it will fall under every eye of our promising suburban center. What an opportunity is this to call attention to and advertise every good thing. Thank you, Mr. Editor, for many favors during these three years we have together been seeking the highest good of the community that we both have learned to love and magnify. Permit me to still continue to be a reader of the Review, and its enthusiastic friend—J. H. Irvine.

The Store That Cares For You

EVERYTHING FOR MEN TO WEAR

Dry Goods and Shoes for Everybody

If common sense were common, there would be more successes. After all, it is the common sense store or individual that is successful. Common sense is uncommon quality which enables decision to be correctly made quickly. It builds self confidence, efficiency, self-reliance, wealth for the individual. It stores confidence, raises efficiency, insures competence, defeats competition, and brings success to the institution. It is not to be hastily acquired. It is the result of inbred ideals and natural or slowly acquired knowledge which may be balanced to a precision by the mental faculties of the man who has it. It isn't entirely abstract, for it builds material things and evidences of itself for the institution or person who exercises it. Deal with common sense men and stores. It pays.

So we advise buying a pair of overall and when the school session is over he should put them on and go to his play with the vim that is natural and not with the feeling that he must take care of his good clothes.
