THE BLESSED By Nancy Byrd Turner

November darkness to its close,
They kneel beside their flickering hearth;
Without, one little wistful rose
Is drooping toward the barren earth.
A frost had bitten the April fruit,
A blight had seared the summer corn,
They had had written to the root
The golden barley, o'erborne.

"But ah," he cries, "I love you, sweet!
What shall we seek of wind or weather
So long as we can surely meet?
The sunshine and the storm together!"

Her meager little garden prayed
All long July for quenching rain;
The red-eyed cattle left the shade
To seek their cooling creek in vain;
The dewy that her hands had christened,
That made the borders beauty-bright,
They bowed their lovely heads and perished;

Her tears had fallen at the sight,
"But ah," she breathes, "I love you,
Dear!
It cannot truly matter whether
We gain the year or lose the year,
Just as we live the year together."

When on the hearth a fragrant fire
And breaks to sudden leaping light;
A cricket in a corner calls;
How silence deepens down the night,
The circle of his young arm makes
A shelter where the dark had been;
The old clock on the mantel wakes
And cries Thanksgiving in
—Youth's Companion.
