There was some talk about a canal, but it was found that it would take at least a year to get proper surveys and estimates for a canal, while it would take several more years to complete the work. Senator Dolph thinks the boat railway could be completed in two or three years if it was properly pushed.

Jailer Morris placed the rope about his neck, the white cap over his head, and at 11.28 his body shot downward. His head twisted to one side, his neck having been apparently broken. A short, spassmodic movement of the legs was the only sign of life apparent. Surrounded by the jury and physicians, the corpse swung to and fro, and at 11.57, nine minutes after the trigger was sprung, he was pronounced dead. The assassin made not an audible sound from the time he left his cell, apparently being lost in contemplation of his awful fate. He was gently dissuaded by Sheriff Gilbert from a determination to make a speech. At 11.58 Jailer Morris unloosened the anchored end of the rope, and the shrouded corpse was slowly lowered and laid in the coffin standing underneath the platform. The face was not badly distorted, though the mouth was open and the tongue protruding.
