POLITICAL CHARACTERISTICS

Political parties are seemingly more or less at variance in this country, more for selfish aggrandizement than for a vigorous advocation of the truest principles that a true and enlightened government need to foster.

High position, the emoluments of office and the social elevation apparent, moves and strengthens the ambitious. sets the political machinery at work for what there is in it, to that exteut, that the efficiency of public morals often become dethrowned to gratify a selfish The date opposite your address on the wish, and the harder the needed pressure to be brought to bear, the more succinct the determination to reach the goal. They rivet every theme to possibilities by making unmerited promises which are seldom fulfilled, wink at opposing elements like ancient patriarchs of the renowned fame of "Good Lord and good devil."

Many of them, while in position as servants of the people, thrust their hands into the till anxious for shining lore, pleasing laurels and that which sums up in dollars and cents. The wishes of the people are therefore kept in the back ground being of the least importance Thus the conduct and tendencies of many politicians are far from being in harmony with public sentiment. They will allow themselves to become crammed into a narrow compass to satisfy the wishes of dogmatic lobbyists that tread the halls of legislation to effect their purpose, or to promote the interests of some syndicate of concentrated capital, where the rights and franchises of the people are endangered. They use their own political strength forgetful of its consequences, and when questioned, try to satisfy the criticism by remarking that "the people do not know what they want themselves."

The people thus ignored and borne lown may kick and kick, while legis- Hundred and Sixty (160) in Oregon City, to lation goes on, if not in harmony with good usage or potent with ergent in-
