The pulp company, in order that the balm timber is not entirely obliterated by the heavy drain made upon it by the demand for logs to work up into pulp, keep a man employed sowing balm seed along river bottoms. As balm trees make a rapid growth in favorable locations, it is thought that enough timber can be kept growing to almost, if not altogether, G. A. Harding's drug store. supply the demand of the mills. The timber can be cut and used for pulp when ten years old. Mr. Spaulding is 10 cents, thoroughly equipped to handle logs, he being owner of the steamer Gray Eagle, which he uses for towing logs and other purposes in his business."

The jury winning a bet of $150 at Oregon City in Office in Barclay building, corner Main some of the fall grain, especially oats, returned a verdict for the plaintiff, Mr. 1858 by riding a sturgeon across the Willamette. He tied an empty keg to the head of the sturgeon, which weighed some 400 pounds, and another keg to its tail, and put a rope around its nose for , fish, and succeeded in riding it safely across, and won the bet. Some who herd the story intimied that it was a fish story, and others classified it in less ambiguous terms. The old gentleman did not like to have his word doubted, and promptly called down his detractors by offering to bet any or all of them $500 that his statement was correct. As the accident occurred nearly 30years ago, it is not likely that there are many now in Oregon City who witnessed it; but, if any there be who did, it is not likely that they have forgotten it. Clark Greenman is the only old settler that remembers the above feat being performed by Mr. Seaman, and says the fish was used to tow rafts and scows for some time, when it was sold by Mr. Seaman and S. W. Moss, who ran a butcher shop, at 10 cents per pound. Mr. Seaman at another time caught a sturgeon weighing 900 pounds.
