How McKinley Prosperity Worries the Farmer and the Laborer.

SOME of the democratic papers which were howling two or three years ago that the dollar was going up and a commodities going down, are now shrieking that the dollar is declining and everything else is increasing. They do not seem to understand that it is the prosperity that has made the change, and the republican party is responsible for the prosperity. Whenever times are good, the price of labor and all sorts of merchandise go up. This is what is taking place now. If the democratic howlers were wise, they would keep silent. By their outcries they are calling attention to a state of things which will make lots of republican votes.

—Globe Democrat.

The above is a huge chunk of wisdom which the Enterprise clipped off one of the "plate" sheets that finds its way to that imperiousistic den.

Wages and products have gone up and the value of the dollar has gone down, eh? Will the unscrupulous scribe who made this highly important discovery please inform a waiting public where and to what extent wages have gone up? It certainly cannot be in Oregon City, where, but a few days ago, a group of the employes in the woolen mills asked for an advance in their wages from $1 to $1.25 per day, and were coolly told by the manager to call at the office and get their time. If in this list is included some of the men who paraded the streets of Oregon City after the announcement of McKinley's election, it would constitute an object lesson that would carry conviction to the mind of even the dullest factory operative.

Some kinds of products have gone up, but what kind of products? Surely not products of the farm, especially wheat, cotton, or in fact any of the great staples of the farm, which are as low as they were prior to McKinley's election in 1896. That election meant something to the protective tariff barons, for immediately after congress convened a law was framed which laid the foundation for the modern trust. Yes, the trusts have advanced the price of numerous articles which the farmers are compelled to buy, and in some instances have cut the wages of their employes, and the average republican editor, it seems, imagines that this is the kind of prosperity the populists should keep still about.

A simple illustration will show how this McKinley prosperity compares with the stagnation that preceded it, when all products were very near the cost of production: A is a farmer who sells his products at a very low figure when prices are measured in dollars, but the articles he buys are also low, so it is plain that the only high-priced articles in the transaction were the dollars he was compelled to buy before he could purchase the necessary supplies. B was a common laborer who received low wages, as measured by dollars, but his necessary supplies, which were the product of both the farm and the factory, were low. The high-priced article in his case is the dollar, also. In order to avoid bankruptcy, the manufacturers, after securing the passage of the Dingley bill, which practically shut out foreign competition, proceeded to combine and form trusts, by which they have been able to raise prices. Their success has been phenomenal, and at present all classes of manufacturers are making a handsome profit.

Now let us notice how the present situation, which insures large profits to the manufacturer, affects A and B. A pays an advance in price for what he buys, measured in dollars, of from 20 to 50 per cent, while the price of his products, with few exceptions, remains the same, in dollars. Therefore, it requires more of his products to purchase the dollar, and in exchanging the dollars so purchased, it requires more of them to secure his necessary supplies. Let us notice now how B fares under this reversible double-back action plan. Wages remaining the same, he is now compelled to perform the same amount of service for the dollar, which will buy less of the necessities of life than formerly, owing to the fact that the trusts have advanced the price of nearly all articles he is compelled to buy.

Hence it seems plain that this boasted prosperity which republicans claim the glory of bringing about, has simply increased the burden of the already over-burdened farmers and laborers, an extra hardship which has put more wealth into the coffers of the trusts, the money trust included.
