Prescription Department

The most important thing about the drug business—the compounding of prescriptions—probably receives the least thought on the part of the public generally.

It is not because the public does not care, but because most druggists seem to prefer to say little or nothing about it. Possibly that preference in some cases is due to a belief that the subject is too deep for the public, and possibly the preference in other cases is due to the fact that their systems are not sufficiently systematic to withstand the judgment of the public. However that may be, I want everybody to know about my system.

I buy only such drugs as I know are pure. Purity is the first consideration. Price is second. No individual is absolutely infallible, and therefore every prescription is checked over by a second man before it leaves my store.

This has proved a positive safeguard against error. Everything in my prescription department is modern and complete in every respect.

I do not entrust prescriptions to boys. I employ registered pharmacists, who know all the details of prescription filling from the bottom up.

Furthermore, the prescription department is under my personal supervision, and I have been compounding prescriptions pretty much all my life.

I am not talking excellence in order to excuse myself for charging what my competitors might call high prices. I do not charge high prices. Many staple goods are sold at decidedly cut-prices.

My prices for prescriptions are never more than most of my competitors—very often they are less. Let me fill your next prescription.

Rev. D. E. Finks, traveling representative of the Presbyterian women's board of home missions, gave a very entertaining and instructive illustrated lecture on the work at the Presbyterian church Sunday night. His lecture showed that vastly more effective work could be done among the heathen in our own land, than in foreign countries. The Presbyterian Board is doing a grand work among the poor white people in the mountains of the south, the inhabitants of New Mexico, the Indians in various sections of the country and among the children of the Mormons in Utah. The lecture gave the auditors a rare opportunity to learn something of the inhabitants in our own country and our own people. The fact is not generally realized that there are millions of ignorant, poverty-stricken white people in the south, who need only the civilizing influence of education and Christianity to convert them into a most desirable class of citizens. Rev. Finks gave an interesting lecture on Alaska Monday night.
