Many teachers are taking the normal course both for the sake of the professional training, now pretty generally demanded, and also as the best means of preparation for securing the state papers.

Our Hatcheries.

The Clackamas river is recognized as one of the best in the country for artificial fish propagation, and the oldest hatchery in the Northwest is that located on the river at the mouth of Clear creek. That is owned and maintained by the United States Fish Commission. It will not be operated this year, however, the government having made arrangements for a hatchery at the Dedman place, four miles below, and near the railroad, where better water is available than at the Clear Creek institution. The plant necessary is not expensive. A third hatchery is operated at the head waters of the Clackamas, within the Cascade forest reserve, about 60 miles by wagon road and trail from this city. This plant is owned by the State of Oregon. It has been run four years without buildings. So far, it has been one of the most satisfactory stations operated by the state, and a permanent plant is expected to be provided there before next season.

E. N. Carter, superintendent of the Clackamas hatchery, is busy getting material ready for the construction of the new hatchery building, four miles further down the river. The old hatchery will be kept intact in charge of a watchman, so that it will be kept in proper order if it is desired to use it in the future. Mr. Carter says that the new hatchery is for temporary use, although it may be made permanent. It has the advantage of pure spring water, and is conveniently situated with reference to the railroad. The same plan of work adopted at the old hatchery will be carried out, except that a specialty will be made of hatching lake trout and whitefish, in addition to chinook salmon. A telephone and other conveniences will be added to the new station, and Mr. Carter will remove his family to Oregon City, the new hatchery being easily accessible by rail.
